EVEN the best-laid plans sometimes go astray. So it has been with the arrangements for Adolph Bolm and his ballet to dance at The Pops next week. Due to regrettable but unavoidable circumstances it has been necessary to cancel the engagement. So for the most part The Pops will run familiar course.

On Monday evening the hall has been reserved for Boston University. Tuesday will be "Request Night." As has been the case in previous seasons, Handel's "Largo" still leads the list of favorites. Second place was voted to Ravel's "La Valse," which also stood high in the voting at the end of the Symphony season just closed. On Friday evening, Mr. Casella will conduct the complete Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony. On Saturday, June 22, Saint-Saëns's Concerto for 'cello and orchestra will be played for the first time at the Pops with Jacobus Langendoen as soloist. The last of the Sunday concerts on June 23, will be an all-Russian program, and will include Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony.

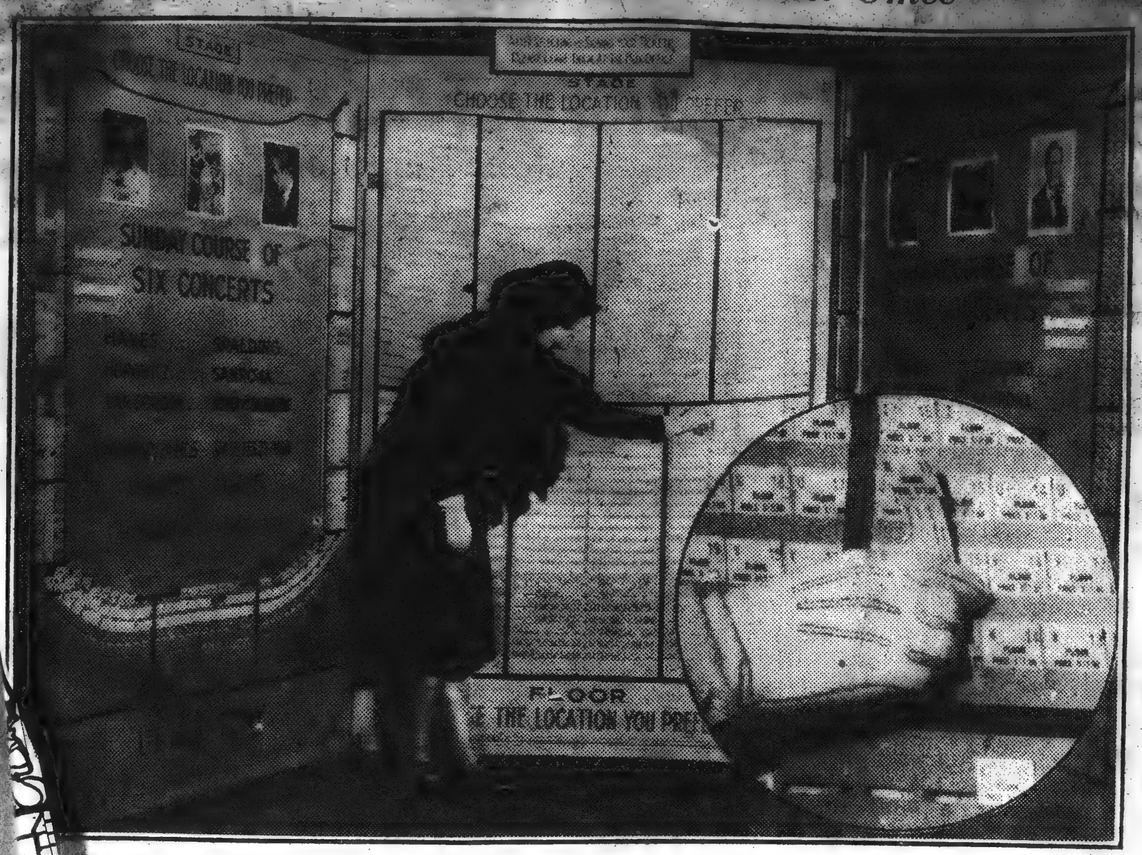
In Prospect

Unless further postponement is deemed advisable, Mr. Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which had been announced originally for last evening, will be played at the concert of Thursday evening, June 27. In the meantime, Mr. Gershwin is expected to assist at rehearsals of the piece, and he will probably be present at The Pops when it is played.

HERALD June 16

178

Self-Service at the Theater Ticket Office



Invented Automatic Ticket Seller by Which Patron Makes His Own Selection of Space for Reservation at Symphony Hall Concerts.

...et Cafeteria' Permits Public Make Own Selection From Board

...ce Proves Success at Boston's Symphony Hall—...Goer Chooses Stubs for Places He Wants ...Leaves Them at Box Office as Reservation

...Portable Automatic ...ack, otherwise known ...afeteria."

...invention for making ...sy is on view daily at ..., Boston.

...of its kind, so far as ...'s making a hit with

...uyer may make his ...location. Every seat ...view, and its exact ...platform is clear. ...the seeker for a ...dicons that the box ...ding out" the best

...ation Blanks

...olds application ...ook just like the ... as they project ...trip. "We —for a series of ...ariety of ...inter. ...generally ... to the box office ...machine ...e are tickets, to ...rove tri- ...s in such a loca- ...through ...ve purchaser has ... of cold ... rack, survey the ...ground and gal- ... to leave ... what tickets have ...followed ...nd choose for him- ...rd, thus

...fice man has to do— ...gh, no doubt—is to ...le window a few feet ...eady to accept the

...the rack appears to ...genuine tickets. The ...of the little paste- ...verage stub of an aver- ...a Symphony Hall con- ...ainder, something like ...enath, is an application ...filled in with the name ...purchaser.

...ying mes- ...re October ...he Presi- ...aid for and taken ...:

...the mag- ...had its curiosity ...lantic by ...factorily by the ...o extend ...ntities of people ...eople as ...d about curiously ...mselves, ...of the rack, smiled ...and an ...ndow of the box ...of their ...'ticket" or two, or ...ally going over to ...th casual interjec- ...thought, from the ...the tickets them- ...—Capt. ...was an 'honor sys- ...or and ...ve taken ... Symphony Hall the ...h in at- ...dy proved its worth. ...praised ... plan which might ...Yellow well be copied far and wide, for it saves the public the bore of waiting in line for tickets and saves wear and tear on box office men, a not inconsiderable item in itself.

KOUSSEVITZKY MAPS SYMPHONY TOUR IN EUROPE

MONITOR JUNE 19

Itinerary for Boston Orchestra Starts With London, Ends With Paris

By WINTHROP P. TRYON
SPECIAL FROM MONITOR BUREAU

NEW YORK—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, coming from Europe for a three-days' stay in America, brings with him an itinerary for a concert tour in May and June, 1930, to include Great Britain, France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Switzerland.

Evidently he has all arrangements provisionally made. For as he talked of the project on board the Ile de France while the liner was steaming up New York harbor, there seemed nothing left to be attended to, except ratification of agreements with the musical bureaus of the various cities chosen.

Yes, one more thing. A couple of official invitations must be accepted; for it appears that the orchestra will be, or already has been, asked to visit France and Germany by the governments of those countries.

Tour Opens in London

According to the proposed schedule, the tour opens in London and closes in Paris, with enough concerts in each place to make a little season. British cities, besides London, noted down are Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow and Edinburgh. Among continental cities, Paris is named first and last. Brussels, Amsterdam, Hamburg, Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Zurich and Geneva are between.

To the two regular concerts in Paris there will be added a special meeting in the interest of the university world at the Sorbonne, which will conclude the enterprise.

As Mr. Koussevitzky set matters forth, the time is propitious in many ways for such a tour as he contemplates.

Speaking generally, orchestral performance has taken on extraordinary development in America of late. There is such a thing as the American orchestral idea which deserves to be known internationally. There is an American orchestral taste of a peculiar and exacting sort.

Would Carry Welcome Message

Many orchestras in the United States might with good reason, therefore, undertake a voyage over the water, and would be quite certain to have a pleasurable message for European audiences.

Then, too, speaking particularly, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, having a long tradition of discipline behind it—nearly 50 years—is completely prepared for the adventure of travel.

An itinerary is what Mr. Koussevitzky has brought back for his brief call, and nothing more. Permission to take the Boston Symphony membership across the sea he has yet to secure. But in regard to that, he manifests no uneasiness. The affair evidently impresses him as requiring consideration, but only on the score of ways and means.

Concerning the tour's practicability he showed no doubt at all. Indeed, he seemed inclined to treat a spring European tour as no less natural and inevitable a thing than the winter season in Boston.

...C AND ...CIANS

GLOBE June 16

Eighth Week of "Pops" in Symphony Hall

One of the features of the coming week which is the last but one at the Pops will be request night next Tuesday, the numbers being determined entirely by the vote of the Pops public, and reveals Handel's Largo as still the favorite in the whole Pops repertory with Ravel's "La Valse" taking second place.

The Monday Pop concert has been entirely taken by Boston University, but all other nights are open to the public. The program of the week follow:

Reqcest Night, Tuesday Evening, June 18—Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Largo, Handel; "La Valse," Ravel; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; "Ave Maria," Schubert; "Italia," rhapsody, Casella; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; waltz, "By the Beatutiful Blue Danube," Strauss; overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky. Encores: "Liebestraum," Liszt-Herbert; march, "On the Mall," Goldman; "Kammenoi Ostrow," Rubinstein.

Wednesday, June, 19—Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Nicolai; Masque Suite for string orchestra, Handel; Rumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; "Marche Joyeuse," Chabrier; "Pastorale d'Ete," Honegger; "Pacific 2-3-1," Honegger; prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; overture to "Rienzi," Wagner; Hungarian march "Rakoczy," Berlioz; "Hungarian Dance," Brahms; "Hungarian Rhapsody" (No. 2), Liszt.

Thursday Evening, June 20—Triumphal march, from "Aida," Verdi; three dances, from "Cephalus and Procris," Gretry-Motti; overture to "Der Freischutz," Weber; Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished," Schubert; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Turkish march, from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin.

Friday Evening, June 21—Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," "A Siegfried Idyll," "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Beethoven; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Saturday Evening, June 22—Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser," Wagner; minuet, Boccherini; Turkish march, from "The Ruins of Athens," Beethoven; overtuure to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, op. 3 (soloist, Jacobus Langendoen, Saint-Saens; Hungarian march, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; Slavonic Dance," Dvorak; intermezzo, "Geyescas," Granados; gipsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner.

Sunday Evening, June 23—Russian program, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36, Tchaikovsky; Polovtsian dances, from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "Night on Bald Mountain," Moussorgsky; "Capriccio Espagnole," Rimsky-Korsakov.

179

TRAV. JUNE 22

One More Week of Pop Concerts

Tomorrow night at Symphony hall Pop concerts will enter upon the last week of their 44th season, although there will be two more nights in the following week, the closing night falling upon Tuesday, July 2.

Special nights of interest next week will be a repetition of the request program on Wednesday and Italian night on Friday, at which Alfredo Casella, the distinguished Italian conductor, will present several new scores of his countrymen.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow (the last Sunday concert) follow:

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 22

"Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens" ..... Beethoven
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ... Verdi
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" .. Rossini
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A Minor, Op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz
Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak
Intermezzo, "Goyescas" ..... Granados
Gypsy Dance, from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
"Ride of the Valkyries" ..... Wagner

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 23
Russian Program

Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36 ..... Tchaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
"Night on Bald Mountain" ..... Moussorgsky
Capriccio Espagnole ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

SATURDAY, JUNE 22

SCRE

POPS SOON IN LAST WEEK

Tomorrow night at Symphony Hall, Pop concerts will enter upon the last week of their 44th season, although there will be two more nights in the following week, the closing night falling upon July 2.

Special nights of interest next week will be a repetitin of the request program on Wednesday and Italian Night on Friday.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow (the last Sunday concert) follow:

SATURDAY

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Minuet ..... Boccherini
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens" ..... Beethoven
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" ... Verdi
Overture to "The Barber of Seville" ... Rossini
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, Op. 33 ..... Saint-Saens
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy" ..... Berlioz
Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak
Intermezzo, "Goyescas" ..... Granados
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner

SUNDAY

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.
Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."
Moussorgsky, "Night on Bald Mountain."
Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnole.

Gershwin Music in Ziegfeld Production

George Gershwin's latest symphonic composition, "An American in Paris," is to be presented by Florenz Ziegfeld in his forthcoming musical comedy, "Show Girl," which opens June 24 at the Colonial. As a part of the symphony, Mme. Albertina Rasch will stage a ballet in which the entire company will participate.

As a preliminary to the presentation of this important musical work, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play "An American in Paris" at two concerts next week, preceding the opening of "Show Girl" at the Colonial Theater on Monday, June 24.

SUN. ADV.

MR. FIEDLER TO PRESENT GOOD MUSIC

Boston's Famous Players to Give Free Concerts on River Esplanade

STAND UNDER ERECTION

Wealthy Patrons Back Novel Enterprise, Aided by the Metropolitan Board

By ALEX WARBURTON.

CLOSE on the heels of the rumor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to tour Europe next summer, comes the announcement that a large contingent of the organization is to give free symphony certs this summer on the Charles river esplanade.

Though voicing its heartiest approval of the plan, the management at Symphony Hall is not sponsoring these concerts. But most Boston musicians see here an opportunity for a wider hearing of members of an orchestra which, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, has come to the top of the orchestral heap in America, and very probably in the world.

Soldout houses at subscription concerts during the past five years have resulted in a demand of thousands to hear the famous orchestra. When the management pointed out that it would gladly accede to this demand if the opportunity were given there were scoffers who alluded to the "exclusiveness" of the organization.

Fiedler's Efforts

The project of the esplanade concerts is entirely the result of Arthur Fiedler's efforts during the past two years. Visualizing a situation in Boston similar to that of other large cities, notably New York, where the Lewisohn Stadium concerts attract thousands of visitors nightly, he interested a group of public-spirited citizens sufficiently to obtain financing for his ventur these concerts will be free; the general public will be en- to hear some of the best al literature played by an ex- t group of musicians.

st who the people are who are to ay the bills remains a mystery, sin e Mr. Fiedler, when interviewed, insisted that they desired to remain anonymous. It is known, however, that N. Penrose Hallowell, of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., has had charge of subscriptions to the fund.

Stand Being Erected

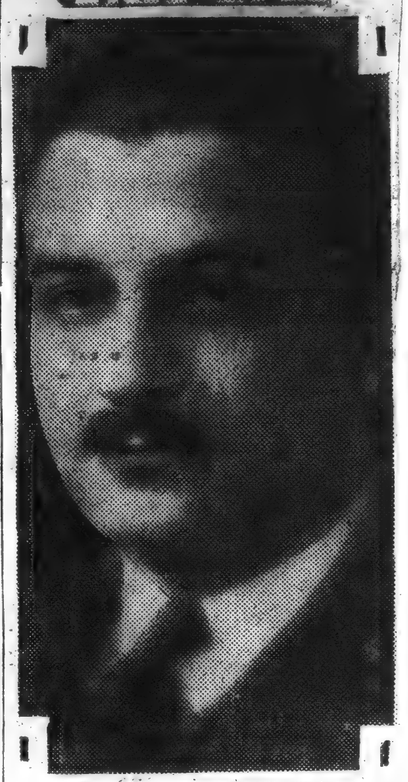
Co-operation of the Metropolitan District Commission, which is erecting a stand for the orchestra and an acoustical shell, insures excellent conditions for the concerts. The programs will be given every evening between 8 and 10 from July 4 to August 8, with the exceptions of the evenings of July 8, 14, 22, 29 and August 4.

The spot selected, at the foot of Chestnut st., in front of the Union Boat Club, was determined because the bend in the Esplanade offered the largest possible area for listeners along the river basin. The picture will be complete with the audience on the grass facing the players and the broad expanse of water.

So far as is known these will be the first concerts of the kind in Boston musical history. It is certainly the first time that a large group of Boston Symphony players has performed outdoors. Although only about half of the Symphony Orchcestra will be engaged—46 players—the group will be large enough to give adequate presentation of popular musical classics.

This has been proved previously by Mr. Fiedler and his Boston Sinfonietta, a miniature orchestra, chosen from the Boston Symphony, giving several concerts in Boston during the past few years and a great many in New England cities. Fiedler also has conducted with notable success concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts, at which a reduced orchestra has been used.

Music Leader
JUNE 23



—Photo by Boris

ARTHUR FIEDLER, noted director, who will conduct free Symphony concerts on the Charles River Esplanade during July and August.

To Attract 10,000

Fiedler is a musician of remarkably varied talents, for he has played violin, viola, celesta, organ and piano with the orchestra, in addition to conducting many of the Pops concerts in recent years. His first experience in conducting was in Berlin at the age of 17. He has the distinction, furthermore, of being the first native Bostonian to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchcestra.

The programs of the Esplanade concerts, Mr. Fiedler pointed out, are being planned with a view to interesting potential audiences of 10,000 persons, most of whom will come from the heart of the city, from the class of people who cannot afford to go often to high-priced concerts. Part of the emphasis, in grouping pieces, will be to make the programs educational in character.

Mr. Fiedler states that the coming season is a experimental one, and that there are no plans, as yet, for ensuing seasons. But it is reasonably expected that if the concerts are well patronized and liked they will be resumed each summer, as they have been in other cities.

This is an interesting speculation for those who continue to ponder whether the Symphony Orchestra eventually will go to Europe.

Problem: How can the Boston Symphony Orchestra play a series of concerts in Europe while it is playing every evening at the Charles River Esplanade?

SIGNING UP for life is perfectly agreeable to Mary Eaton and Oscar Shaw in "The Cocoanuts" at the Scollay.

Bos. SUN. ADV. JUNE 23-

POP CONCERTS GO INTO LAST FULL WEEK OF SEASON TONIGHT

THe Pop concerts at Symphony Hall are entering upon what is virtually their last week, although there will be two concerts next week, with Tuesday, July 2, as the closing night of the season.

Alfredo Casella will repeat the request program next Wednesday for the benefit of many unable to gain admission last Tuesday.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris" which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of Jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

Next Friday will bring the "Italian Night" of the season at which the distinguished Italian conductor will introduce several new scores of his country.

A Russian program, as follows, will be given tonight:

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"
Moussorgsky, "Night on Bald Mountain"
Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnole
MONDAY
Coronation March from "The Prophet" Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn
Overture to "Der Freischutz" ... Weber
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Suite, "The False Harlequin" ... Malipiero
"Italia," Rhapsody ... Casella
Suite; "Peer Gynt" ... Grieg
Dance of the Waves, from "Lorelei" Catalani
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar" ... Verdi
TUESDAY
Marche Militaire ... Schubert
Suite from "Carmen" ... Bizet
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" Berlioz
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Barcarolle ... Offenbach
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" ... Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ... Liszt
WEDNESDAY
Pomp and Circumstance ... Elgar
Largo ... Handel
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem ... Ravel
Overture to "William Tell" ... Rossini
Ave Maria ... Schubert
"Italia," Rhapsody ... Caselia
Suite; "Peer Gynt" ... Grieg
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Ouverture Solenelle, "1812" .. Tchaikovsky
Encores: Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert, Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein
THURSDAY
Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza per Amore" ... Paisiello
Dance Suite from "Cephalus and Procris" ... Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 .. Beethoven
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 ... Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite ... Gershwin (First performance in Boston)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ... Wagner
Introduction to Act III "Lohengrin" Wagner
"Ride of the Valkyries" ... Wagner
FRIDAY
Overture to "Il Matrimonio Segreto" Cimarosa
Concerto for Violin and String Orchestra in A minor ... Vivaldi
Overture to "Semiramide" ... Rossini
"Le Furie d'Arlecchino," Overture Adriano Lualdi
Three Children's Pieces ... Santoliquido
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara" Casella
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Overture to "La Forza del Destino" Verdi

HER, June 29

MUSIC

"AN AMERICAN IN PARIS"

The storms of applause that broke loose at the conclusion of the final blazing strains of George Gershwin's new suite, "An American in Paris," having its first hearing in Boston last night, demonstrated the heights of enthusiasm that can be reached by a Pop concert audience, given the right incentive. Again and again must the composer bow his acknowledgements to satisfy the throng that so nearly filled Symphony hall. Gracefully he responded to the oft-repeated acclaim, and as graciously indicated his thanks to Mr. Casella and to the orchestra for their fine rendition of this vivid and amusing tonal representation of life in "the City of Light."

There is really but little need for the guidance of the printed description of Yankee's experiences as he saunters down the Champs Elysees on a sunny morning to comprehend that he is somewhat confounded by the swirl of traffic, with the "real Paris taxi horns" bleating out their bellows of warning. He glimpses the cafe life, and the gay dancing holds his eye for a time. Then comes an amusing interlude when he is addressed by a gentle voice—so hints the solo violin—with which (or should we say with whom?) he holds pleasant, though subdued converse.

A wave of nostalgia overtakes him, soon to be swept away by a more joyous sensation indicated by the nonchalant strains of the Charleston, swinging gloriously and riotously along to the final blaze of a full orchestra in all its most rampant hilarity. In fact, this general theme of joviality left the audience in a refreshingly happy mood. There was also a great ovation for the rendition of the Brandenburg Concerto by Bach. The delicate and plaintive dance suite from "Cephalus and Procris" by Gretry-Mottl called forth much enthusiasm.

For the rest, the numbers included Paisiello's overture to "Nina, O La Pazza per Amore," Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," and the three Wagner selections—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

F. A. B.

NEW GERSHWIN SUITE AT POP CONCERT

GLOBE

"An American in Paris" Wins Composer an Ovation

JUNE 29

George Gershwin was applauded and cheered for many minutes at the Pop Concert last night when he came to the stage at the end of the first Boston performance of his latest elaborate composition, the suite, "An American in Paris." He tried his best to share the applause with Mr Casella and the orchestra, but they, like the audience, wanted to express their liking and admiration for Gershwin's music.

The hall was completely filled. There was hearty applause for every number on an unusually attractive program, particularly for a little suite from Gretry, for Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, and, somewhat unexpectedly, for Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto. The performance of all these numbers was unusually good.

"An American in Paris," written at Mr Damrosch's request for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, was first performed by them last December in New York. Mr Gershwin has now introduced an elaborately staged version of the piece into the musical comedy "Show Girl," which had its first performance anywhere at the Colonial Theatre this week. Last night's was therefore, to be strictly accurate for the sake of the record, the first concert performance in Boston, not the first hearing of the score.

A lively and amusing program note by Deems Taylor was reprinted in condensed form in last night's Pops programs. It depicts the American walking down the Champs Elysees, passing a cafe where the Maxixe is still popular, "if one is to believe the trombones"; noting the Paris taxi horns; carrying on a one-sided conversation with "a solo violin in the soprano register"; getting the blues; relieving his homesickness by talking to a compatriot and deciding finally that "it will be great to get home, but meanwhile this is Paris."

But it would be possible to construct any number of equally ingenious and amusing program notes for this piece, if one were Deems Taylor. The music does not really tell any definite story; music never can do that. It is merely a loosely connected series of musical episodes, full of the rhythmic vitality and the gravely sensuous melody that distinguish Gershwin's best work and make him perhaps the foremost of living American composers. He might just as well have called it his "Second Rhapsody." He ought also to have spoken of a "New Yorker in Paris" rather than of an "American." There is much more of Broadway than of Main st in this music.

It ought not to be necessary to say that this piece is much more than mere everyday "jazz," and that it is quite worth taking very seriously as music. Mr Casella may well have put Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto just before it on the program last night because he felt that there was something in common between that

179

TRAV. JUNE 22

One More Week of Pop Concerts

Tomorrow night at Symphony hall Pop concerts will enter upon the last week of their 44th season, although there will be two more nights in the following week, the closing night falling upon Tuesday, July 2.

Special nights of interest next week will be a repetition of the request program on Wednesday and Italian night on Friday, at which Alfredo Casella, the distinguished Italian conductor, will present several new scores of his countrymen.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow (the last Sunday concert) follow:

SATURDAY EVENING, JUNE 22

"Entrance of the Guests Into the Wartburg," "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra in A Minor, Op. 33.....Saint-Saens
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Intermezzo, "Goyescas".....Granados
Gypsy Dance, from "Carmen".....Bizet
"Ride of the Valkyries".....Wagner

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 23
Russian Program

Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36.....Tchaikovsky
Polovtsian Dances, from "Prince Igor".....Borodin
"Night on Bald Mountain".....Moussorgsky
Capriccio Espagnole.....Rimsky-Korsakov

-SATURDAY, JUNE 22

SCRE

POPS SOON IN LAST WEEK

Tomorrow night at Symphony Hall, Pop concerts will enter upon the last week of their 44th season, although there will be two more nights in the following week, the closing night falling upon July 2.

Special nights of interest next week will be a repetitin of the request program on Wednesday and Italian Night on Friday.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

The programs for tonight and tomorrow (the last Sunday concert) follow:

SATURDAY

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Minuet.....Boccherini
Turkish March, from "The Ruins of Athens".....Beethoven
Overture to "La Forsa del Destino".....Verdi
Overture to "The Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, Op. 33.....Saint-Saens
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak
Intermezzo, "Goyescas".....Granados
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner

SUNDAY

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36.
Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."
Moussorgsky, "Night on Bald Mountain."
Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnole.

Gershwin Music in Ziegfeld Production

George Gershwin's latest symphonic composition, "An American in Paris," is to be presented by Florenz Ziegfeld in his forthcoming musical comedy, "Show Girl," which opens June 24 at the Colonial. As a part of the symphony, Mme. Albertina Rasch will stage a ballet in which the entire company will participate.

As a preliminary to the presentation of this important musical work, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play "An American in Paris" at two concerts next week, preceding the opening of "Show Girl" at the Colonial Theater on Monday, June 24.

SUN. ADV.

MR. FIEDLER TO PRESENT GOOD MUSIC

Boston's Famous Players to Give Free Concerts on River Esplanade

STAND UNDER ERECTION

Wealthy Patrons Back Novel Enterprise, Aided by the Metropolitan Board

By ALEX WARBURTON.

CLOSE on the heels of the rumor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to tour Europe next summer, comes the announcement that a large contingent of the organization is to give free symphony certs this summer on the Charles river esplanade.

Though voicing its heartiest approval of the plan, the management at Symphony Hall is not sponsoring these concerts. But most Boston musicians see here an opportunity for a wider hearing of members of an orchestra which, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, has come to the top of the orchestral heap in America, and very probably in the world.

Soldout houses at subscription concerts during the past five years have resulted in a demand of thousands to hear the famous orchestra. When the management pointed out that it would gladly accede to this demand if the opportunity were given there were scoffers who alluded to the "exclusiveness" of the organization.

Fiedler's Efforts

The project of the esplanade concerts is entirely the result of Arthur Fiedler's efforts during the past two years. Visualizing a situation in Boston similar to that of other large cities, notably New York, where the Lewisohn Stadium concerts attract thousands of visitors nightly, he interested a group of public-spirited citizens sufficiently to obtain financing for his ventur[illegible]

[illegible] these concerts will be free; [illegible] the general public will be en[illegible] to hear some of the best [illegible]al literature played by an ex[illegible]t group of musicians.

[illegible]st who the people are who are to [illegible]ay the bills remains a mystery, sin[illegible]e Mr. Fiedler, when interviewed, insisted that they desired to remain anonymous. It is known, however, that N. Penrose Hallowell, of the firm of Lee, Higginson & Co., has had charge of subscriptions to the fund.

Stand Being Erected

Co-operation of the Metropolitan District Commission, which is erecting a stand for the orchestra and an acoustical shell, insures excellent conditions for the concerts. The programs will be given every evening between 8 and 10 from July 4 to August 8, with the exceptions of the evenings of July 8, 14, 22, 29 and August 4.

The spot selected, at the foot of Chestnut st., in front of the Union Boat Club, was determined because the bend in the Esplanade offered the largest possible area for listeners along the river basin. The picture will be complete with the audience on the grass facing the players and the broad expanse of water.

So far as is known these will be the first concerts of the kind in Boston musical history. It is certainly the first time that a large group of Boston Symphony players has performed outdoors. Although only about half of the Symphony Orchcestra will be engaged—46 players—the group will be large enough to give adequate presentation of popular musical classics.

This has been proved previously by Mr. Fiedler and his Boston Sinfonietta, a miniature orchestra, chosen from the Boston Symphony, giving several concerts in Boston during the past few years and a great many in New England cities. Fiedler also has conducted with notable success concerts at the Museum of Fine Arts, at which a reduced orchestra has been used.

Music Leader
JUNE 23

—Photo by Boris

ARTHUR FIEDLER, noted director, who will conduct free Symphony concerts on the Charles River Esplanade during July and August.

To Attract 10,000

Fiedler is a musician of remarkably varied talents, for he has played violin, viola, celesta, organ and piano with the orchestra, in addition to conducting many of the Pops concerts in recent years. His first experience in conducting was in Berlin at the age of 17. He has the distinction, furthermore, of being the first native Bostonian to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchcestra.

The programs of the Esplanade concerts, Mr. Fiedler pointed out, are being planned with a view to interesting potential audiences of 10,000 persons, most of whom will come from the heart of the city, from the class of people who cannot afford to go often to high-priced concerts. Part of the emphasis, in grouping pieces, will be to make the programs educational in character.

Mr. Fiedler states that the coming season is a experimental one, and that there are no plans, as yet, for ensuing seasons. But it is reasonably expected that if the concerts are well patronized and liked they will be resumed each summer, as they have been in other cities.

This is an interesting speculation for those who continue to ponder whether the Symphony Orchestra eventually will go to Europe.

Problem: How can the Boston Symphony Orchestra play a series of concerts in Europe while it is playing every evening at the Charles River Esplanade?

SIGNING UP for life is perfectly agreeable to Mary Eaton and Oscar Shaw in "The Cocoanuts" at the Scollay.

Bos. SUN. ADV. JUNE 23

POP CONCERTS GO INTO LAST FULL WEEK OF SEASON TONIGHT

THe Pop concerts at Symphony Hall are entering upon what is virtually their last week, although there will be two concerts next week, with Tuesday, July 2, as the closing night of the season.

Alfredo Casella will repeat the request program next Wednesday for the benefit of many unable to gain admission last Tuesday.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris" which will have its first Boston performance next Thursday and which will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of Jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece and to be present at its performance.

Next Friday will bring the "Italian Night" of the season at which the distinguished Italian conductor will introduce several new scores of his country.

A Russian program, as follows, will be given tonight:

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"
Moussorgsky, "Night on Bald Mountain"
Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnole

MONDAY

Coronation March from "The Prophet".....Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Overture to "Der Freischutz".....Weber
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Suite, "The False Harlequin".....Malipiero
"Italia," Rhapsody.....Casella
Suite; "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Dance of the Waves, from "Lorelei".....Catalani
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar".....Verdi

TUESDAY

Marche Militaire.....Schubert
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished".....Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival".....Bertioz
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Barcarolle.....Offenbach
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz".....Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt

WEDNESDAY

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Largo.....Handel
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem.....Ravel
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ave Maria.....Schubert
"Italia," Rhapsody.....Casella
Suite; "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Ouverture Solenelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Encores: Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert, Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein

THURSDAY

Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza per Amore".....Paisiello
Dance Suite from "Cephalus and Procris".....Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1.....Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite.....Gershwin
(First performance in Boston)
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Introduction to Act III "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Ride of the Valkyries".....Wagner

FRIDAY

Overture to "Il Matrimonio Segreto".....Cimarosa
Concerto for Violin and String Orchestra in A minor.....Vivaldi
Overture to "Semiramide".....Rossini
"Le Furie d'Arlecchino," Overture.....Adriano Lualdi
Three Children's Pieces.....Santoliquido
Suite from the Ballet, "La Giara".....Casella
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi

SATURDAY

Overture to "Coriolanus".....Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber-Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
A Musical Joke.....Mozart
"An American in Paris".....Gershwin
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
"Espana," Rhapsody.....Chabrier

NEW GERSHWIN SUITE AT POP CONCERT

GLOBE

"An American in Paris" Wins Composer an Ovation

JUNE 29

George Gershwin was applauded and cheered for many minutes at the Pop Concert last night when he came to the stage at the end of the first Boston performance of his latest elaborate composition, the suite, "An American in Paris." He tried his best to share the applause with Mr Casella and the orchestra, but they, like the audience, wanted to express their liking and admiration for Gershwin's music.

The hall was completely filled. There was hearty applause for every number on an unusually attractive program, particularly for a little suite from Gretry, for Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture, and, somewhat unexpectedly, for Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto. The performance of all these numbers was unusually good.

"An American in Paris," written at Mr Damrosch's request for the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, was first performed by them last December in New York. Mr Gershwin has now introduced an elaborately staged version of the piece into the musical comedy "Show Girl," which had its first performance anywhere at the Colonial Theatre this week. Last night's was therefore, to be strictly accurate for the sake of the record, the first concert performance in Boston, not the first hearing of the score.

A lively and amusing program note by Deems Taylor was reprinted in condensed form in last night's Pops programs. It depicts the American walking down the Champs Elysees, passing a cafe where the Maxixe is still popular, "if one is to believe the trombones"; noting the Paris taxi horns; carrying on a one-sided conversation with "a solo violin in the soprano register"; getting the blues; relieving his homesickness by talking to a compatriot and deciding finally that "it will be great to get home, but meanwhile this is Paris."

But it would be possible to construct any number of equally ingenious and amusing program notes for this piece, if one were Deems Taylor. The music does not really tell any definite story; music never can do that. It is merely a loosely connected series of musical episodes, full of the rhythmic vitality and the gravely sensuous melody that distinguish Gershwin's best work and make him perhaps the foremost of living American composers. He might just as well have called it his "Second Rhapsody." He ought also to have spoken of a "New Yorker in Paris" rather than of an "American." There is much more of Broadway than of Main st in this music.

It ought not to be necessary to say that this piece is much more than mere everyday "jazz," and that it is quite worth taking very seriously as music. Mr Casella may well have put Bach's First Brandenburg Concerto just before it on the program last night because he felt that there was something in common between that phony hall. Gracefully he responded to the oft-repeated acclaim, and as graciously indicated his thanks to Mr. Casella and to the orchestra for their fine rendition of this vivid and amusing tonal representation of life in "the City of Light."

Attend Nurse Graduations a

500 CLUBWOMEN GUESTS OF THE CITY

There is really but little need for the guidance of the printed description of Yankee's experiences as he saunters down the Champs Elysees on a sunny morning to comprehend that he is somewhat confounded by the swirl of traffic, with the "real Paris taxi horns" bleating out their bellows of warning. He glimpses the cafe life, and the gay dancing holds his eye for a time. Then comes an amusing interlude when he is addressed by a gentle voice—so hints the solo violin—with which (or should we say with whom?) he holds pleasant, though subdued converse.

A wave of nostalgia overtakes him, soon to be swept away by a more joyous sensation indicated by the nonchalant strains of the Charleston, swinging gloriously and riotously along to the final blaze of a full orchestra in all its most rampant hilarity. In fact, this general theme of joviality left the audience in a refreshingly happy mood. There was also a great ovation for the rendition of the Brandenburg Concerto by Bach. The delicate and plaintive dance suite from "Cephalus and Procris" by Gretry-Mottl called forth much enthusiasm.

For the rest, the numbers included Paisiello's overture to "Nina, O La Pazza per Amore," Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," and the three Wagner selections—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

F. A. B.

~~SUNDAY, JUNE 23~~

LAST WEEK OF THE POPS

The Pops concerts at Symphony hall are entering upon what is virtually their last week, although there will be two more concerts next week with Tuesday, July 2, as the closing night of the season. Alfredo Casella will repeat the request program on next Wednesday for the benefit of the many who were unable to gain admission to the request night last Tuesday.

An important novelty will be George Gershwin's "An American in Paris," which will have its first performance in Boston next Thursday. It will be repeated on Saturday. This foremost of jazz composers is visiting Boston to supervise the preparation of this piece. He will be present at its performance. Next Friday will bring the "Italian Night" of the season at which Mr. Casella will introduce several new scores of his country.

There follow the programs of the week, including that of tonight, which is the last Sunday concert of the season:

SUNDAY EVENING, JUNE 23

Russian Program

Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor, op. 36.
Borodin, Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor."
Moussorgsky, "Night on Bald Mountain."
Rimsky-Korsakov, Capriccio Espagnole.

MONDAY EVENING

Coronation March from "The Prophet," Meyerbeer
Suite, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn
Overture to "Der Freischuetz" ..... Weber
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Suite, "The False Harlequin" .... Malipiero
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Dance of the Waves, from "Lorelei," Catalani
Overture to "Nebuchadnezzar" ..... Verdi

TUESDAY EVENING

Marche Militaire ..... Schubert
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Symphony in B minor, "Unfinished" Schubert
Overture, "The Roman Carnival" .. Berlioz
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Barcarolle ..... Offenbach
Intermezzo, "L'Amico Fritz" .... Mascagni
Second Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt

WEDNESDAY EVENING

Request Program (Repeated)

Pomp and Circumstance ..... Elgar
Largo ..... Handel
"La Valse," Choregraphic Poem .... Ravel
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Ave Maria ..... Schubert
"Italia," Rhapsody ..... Casella
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Waltz, "By the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss
Overture Solenelle, "1812" .... Tchaikovsky
Encores: Liebestraum, Liszt-Herbert
Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein

THURSDAY

Overture to "Nina, O La Pazza per Amore," Paisiello
Dance Suite from "Cephalus and Procris" Gretry-Mottl
Overture to "Lenore" No. 3 .... Beethoven
Brandenburg Concerto No. 1 ..... Bach
"An American in Paris," Suite .... Gershwin
(First performance in Boston)
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ... Wagner
Introduction to Act III "Lohengrin .. Wagner
"Ride of the Valkyries." ..... Wagner

FRIDAY EVENING

Italian Program

Overture to "Il Matrimonio Segreto," Cimarosa
Concerto for Violin and String Orchestra, in A minor ..... Vivaldi
Overture to "Semiramide" ..... Rossini
"Le Furie d'Arlecchino," Overture, Adriano Lualdi
Three Children's Pieces ..... Santoliquido
Suit from the Ballet, "La Giara," Casella
Ballet of the Hours, "La Gioconda." Ponchielli
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni
Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi

SATURDAY EVENING

Overture to "Coriolanus" ..... Beethoven
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlioz
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
A musical Joke ..... Mozart
"An American in Paris" ..... Gershwin
Bacchanale, Samson and Delilah, Saint-Saens
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
"Espana," Rhapsody ..... Chabrier

181

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER
MAY 2 - 1929

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR LEAVES

NEW YORK, May 2 (AP).—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky yesterday on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 2 1929

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP)—Serve Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD
MAY 2 - 1929

refreshments followed.

Symphony Head Sails.

New York, May 2 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera, Boris Goudenoff, in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY LEADER SAILS

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — Serv Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs Koussevitsky today on the steamshi Mauretana. He will direct five pre sentations of the Russian Opera "Bori Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20 after which he will spend the summe in the Pyrenees and return to Americ in September.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

KOUSSEVITSKY SAILS.

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP) Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON-JOURNAL
MAY 4 - 1929

New York, May 6.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers conceris Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,000, but when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
1929

Your Broadway and Mine

By WALTER WINCHELL.

NEW YORK, May 3.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers concerns Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,000, but when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
MAY 10 1929

Pop Concerts Now in Their Forty-Fourth Season

By AMBROSE L. McLAUGHLN

ONCE again the Pop concerts are on at Symphony hall, Boston. This novel and extremely popular form of entertainment dates back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. One would search in vain in other large cities for anything just like the Pops. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability. The programs are never entirely too solemn for lighter tastes, yet never too "jazzy" for the musically particular. They range from an entire symphony down to a march, waltz, or sugary trifle. The Pop-goers gather at tables, partake of "Pop Punch," near beer, pretzels, ice cream, etc. They converse with their companions and enjoy music of many different styles exceptionally well performed.

Last week the 44th season of the Pops began with Alfredo Cassella again conducting. This will be his third consecutive year. His programs have been warmly praised for their comprehensive character. During the present week the programs are being enhanced by appearances of the Duncan Dancers.

This skilful group occupy the third or final section of the program. Chief among their rhythmic offerings is their interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Casella's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails. Casella is one of the greatest of living Italian composers; his scores are played at symphony concerts the world over; his ballet "The Jar" was an outstanding success at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York two years ago. His rhapsody "Italia" is a long standing favorite at the Pops. Casella is also Italy's most brilliant pianist, and one of her finest conductors. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

SEE PAGE 184 for MAY 12

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

concerning which The Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

B. Martinu, the young Czech composer, has completed his opera "The Soldier and the Dancing Girl" and has also finished two other works, a symphony in one movement, written in commemoration of the first French flag given to Czech legionaires in 1917, which Koussevitzky is to perform for the first time next November in Boston, and the other a Jazz Suite for Jazz (Prelude, Blues, Boston, Finale), which was played by H. Steinberg in Prague for the first time last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA BALKS

PARIS. — Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera "Boris Godunof" at the Paris opera, has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

New York Telegraph

Paris Orchestra Objects To Three Rehearsals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have broken his contract to conduct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera. Members of the Paris Opera Orchestra declined to rehearse three times instead of the customary two, it was explained.

VARIETY
MAY 22 1929

Operatic Sensation

Paris, May 21.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston orchestra leader, has postponed rehearsals as guest conductor of the Paris Opera, following five special performances of Moussorgsky's opera, "Boris Goudenov." Musicians refused to attend more than two rehearsals.

Incident is the prevailing sensation in private opera circles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

...PS' ...VITZKY ...es— ...AMERICA

...Has Most ...se Musical De- ...opment in World

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreness, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State Orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS U. S. MUSICAL PROGRESS

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Godounow" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreneess, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States", said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian state orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth".

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter". He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEES INTENSE MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT IN U. S.

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera, "Boris Goudenof," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

181

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
EVE. LEADER
MAY 2 - 1929

EIGHT DEATHS IN BERLIN DUE TO MAY DIGT

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 2 1929

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP)—Serve Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD
MAY 2 - 1929

refreshments followed.

Symphony Head Sails.

New York, May 2 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera, Boris Goudenoff, in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAY

SYMPHONY LEADER SAILS

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — Serve Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky today on the steamship Mauretana. He will direct five presentations of the Russian Opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20 after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

KOUSSEVITSKY SAILS.

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP) Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON-JOURNAL
MAY 4 - 1929

New York, May 6.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers concerns Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,000, but when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
729

Your Broadway and Mine

By WALTER WINCHELL.

NEW YORK, May 3.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers concerns Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,000, but when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
MAY 10 1929

Pop Concerts Now in Their Forty-Fourth Season

By AMBROSE L. McLAUGHLIN

ONCE again the Pop concerts are on at Symphony hall, Boston. This novel and extremely popular form of entertainment dates back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. One would search in vain in other large cities for anything just like the Pops. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability. The programs are never entirely too solemn for lighter tastes, yet never too "jazzy" for the musically particular. They range from an entire symphony down to a march, waltz, or sugary trifle. The Pop-goers gather at tables, partake of "Pop Punch," near beer, pretzels, ice cream, etc. They converse with their companions and enjoy music of many different styles exceptionally well performed.

Last week the 44th season of the Pops began with Alfredo Cassella again conducting. This will be his third consecutive year. His programs have been warmly praised for their comprehensive character. During the present week the programs are being enhanced by appearances of the Duncan Dancers.

This skilful group occupy the third or final section of the program. Chief among their rhythmic offerings is their interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Casella's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails. Casella is one of the greatest of living Italian composers; his scores are played at symphony concerts the world over; his ballet "The Jar" was an outstanding success at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York two years ago. His rhapsody "Italia" is a long standing favorite at the Pops. Casella is also Italy's most brilliant pianist, and one of her finest conductors. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

SEE PAGE 184 for MAY 12

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

concerning which The Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

B. Martinu, the young Czech composer, has completed his opera "The Soldier and the Dancing Girl" and has also finished two other works, a symphony in one movement, written in commemoration of the first French flag given to Czech legionaires in 1917, which Koussevitzky is to perform for the first time next November in Boston, and the other a Jazz Suite for Jazz (Prelude, Blues, Boston, Finale), which was played by H. Steinberg in Prague for the first time last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA BALKS

PARIS. — Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera "Boris Godunof" at the Paris opera, has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

New York Telegraph

Paris Orchestra Objects To Three Rehearsals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have broken his contract to conduct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera. Members of the Paris Opera Orchestra declined to rehearse three times instead of the customary two, it was explained.

VARIETY
MAY 22 1929

Operatic Sensation

Paris, May 21.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston orchestra leader, has postponed rehearsals as guest conductor of the Paris Opera, following five special performances of Moussorgsky's opera, "Boris Goudenov." Musicians refused to attend more than two rehearsals.

Incident is the prevailing sensation in private opera circles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

...VITZKY ...AMERICA

...PS'...PS—

...Has Most ...se Musical De- ...ment in World

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreness, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State Orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS U. S. MUSICAL PROGRESS

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Godounow" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreneess, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States", said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian state orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestra advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth".

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter". He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEES INTENSE MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT IN U. S.

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera, "Boris Goudenof," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

181

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 2 1929

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP)—Serve Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD
MAY 2 - 1929

refreshments followed.

Symphony Head Sails.

New York, May 2 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera, Boris Goudenoff, in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY LEADER SAILS

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — Serv Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs Koussevitsky today on the steamshi Mauretana. He will direct five pre sentations of the Russian Opera "Bori Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20 after which he will spend the summe in the Pyrenees and return to Americ in September.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

KOUSSEVITSKY SAILS.

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP) Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON-JOURNAL
MAY 4 - 1929

New York, May 6.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers conceris Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5[illegible] when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees

THIS CLIPPING FROM DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
1929

Your Broadway and Mine

By WALTER WINCHELL.

NEW YORK, May 3.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers concerns Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,000, but when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.

ONCE again the Pop concerts are on at Symphony hall, Boston. This novel and extremely popular form of entertainment dates back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. One would search in vain in other large cities for anything just like the Pops. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability. The programs are never entirely too solemn for lighter tastes, yet never too "jazzy" for the musically particular. They range from an entire symphony down to a march, waltz, or sugary trifle. The Pop-goers gather at tables, partake of "Pop Punch," near beer, pretzels, ice cream, etc. They converse with their companions and enjoy music of many different styles exceptionally well performed.

Last week the 44th season of the Pops began with Alfredo Cassella again conducting. This will be his third consecutive year. His programs have been warmly praised for their comprehensive character. During the present week the programs are being enhanced by appearances of the Duncan Dancers.

This skilful group occupy the third or final section of the program. Chief among their rhythmic offerings is their interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Casella's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails. Casella is one of the greatest of living Italian composers; his scores are played at symphony concerts the world over; his ballet "The Jar" was an outstanding success at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York two years ago. His rhapsody "Italia" is a long standing favorite at the Pops. Casella is also Italy's most brilliant pianist, and one of her finest conductors. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

SEE PAGE
184
for MAY 12

N. Y. THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
MAY 12 1929

BOSTON BEGINS THE 'POPS'

Summer Music Plans in Other Centres—Local Band to Start in June

MELODY flowed at the May Day opening of the Boston "Pops," concerning which The Boston Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

B. Martinu, the young Czech composer, has completed his opera "The Soldier and the Dancing Girl" and has also finished two other works, a symphony in one movement, written in commemoration of the first French flag given to Czech legionaires in 1917, which Koussevitzky is to perform for the first time next November in Boston, and the other a Jazz Suite for Jazz (Prelude, Blues, Boston, Finale), which was played by H. Steinberg in Prague for the first time last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA BALKS

PARIS. — Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera "Boris Godunof" at the Paris opera, has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

New York Telegraph

Paris Orchestra Objects To Three Rehearsals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have broken his contract to conduct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera. Members of the Paris Opera Orchestra declined to rehearse three times instead of the customary two, it was explained.

VARIETY
MAY 22 1929

Operatic Sensation

Paris, May 21.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston orchestra leader, has postponed rehearsals as guest conductor of the Paris Opera, following five special performances of Moussorgsky's opera, "Boris Goudenov." Musicians refused to attend more than two rehearsals.

Incident is the prevailing sensation in private opera circles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

VITZKY AMERICA

Has Most Intense Musical Development in World

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreness, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State Orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS U. S. MUSICAL PROGRESS

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Godounow" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreneess, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States", said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian state orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth".

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter". He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
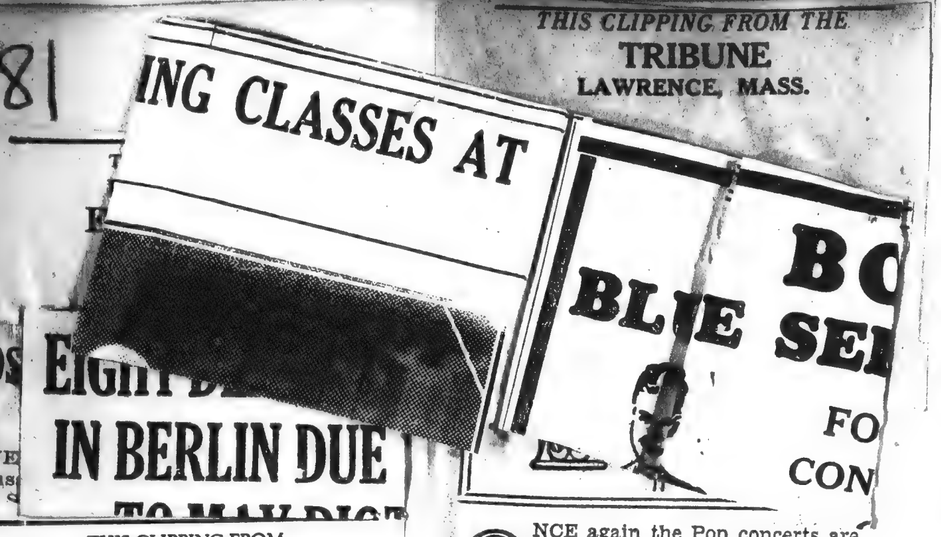
GAZETTE

SEES INTENSE MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT IN U. S.

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera, "Boris Goudenof," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

181



THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 2 1929

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP)—Serve Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD
MAY 2 - 1929

refreshments followed.

Symphony Head Sails.

New York, May 2 (AP)—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs. Koussevitsky on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera, Boris Goudenoff, in Paris, beginning May 20, after which he will spend the summer in the Pyrenees and return to America in September.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

SYMPHONY LEADER SAILS

NEW YORK, May 1 (AP) — Serv Koussevitsky, conductor of the Bosto Symphony orchestra, sailed with Mrs Koussevitsky today on the steamshi Mauretana. He will direct five pre sentations of the Russian Opera "Bori Goudenoff" in Paris, beginning May 20 after which he will spend the summe in the Pyrenees and return to Americ in September.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

KOUSSEVITSKY SAILS.

NEW YORK, May 1—(AP) Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, sailed today on the steamship Mauretania. He will direct five presentations of the Russian opera "Boris Goudenoff" in Paris.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH.
MOON-JOURNAL
MAY 4 - 1929

New York, May 6.—An interesting commentary on Boston music lovers conceris Heifetz, who was urged to serve as a guest player with the Boston Symphony crew. He asked for $5,[illegible] when they reminded him that it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.

ONCE again the Pop concerts are on at Symphony hall, Boston. This novel and extremely popular form of entertainment dates back to Boston's earliest music annals. They are indeed as much a part of Boston as the Common or the golden dome of the State House. One would search in vain in other large cities for anything just like the Pops. Perhaps the secret of the popularity of the Boston Pops lies in their happy and precisely adjusted blend of music and sociability. The programs are never entirely too solemn for lighter tastes, yet never too "jazzy" for the musically particular. They range from an entire symphony down to a march, waltz, or sugary trifle. The Pop-goers gather at tables, partake of "Pop Punch," near beer, pretzels, ice cream, etc. They converse with their companions and enjoy music of many different styles exceptionally well performed.

Last week the 44th season of the Pops began with Alfredo Cassella again conducting. This will be his third consecutive year. His programs have been warmly praised for their comprehensive character. During the present week the programs are being enhanced by appearances of the Duncan Dancers.

This skilful group occupy the third or final section of the program. Chief among their rhythmic offerings is their interpretation of Tschaikowsky's Pathetique Symphony.

A few historical items concerning the Pops might not be out of place here. They date back to the summer of 1885 when the Boston Symphony orchestra was only four years old. There was then started the project of a supplementary series of concerts of popular character to suit the warmer season. They were modelled after the "Bilse" concerts of Berlin, the formal rows of seats were removed and tables were installed so that one might sip wine or beer, munch a sandwich or smoke, while listening to a waltz of Strauss or a march of Sousa. The experiment was an immediate success. The "Promenade concerts" soon came to be called "Pops" in the vernacular, whether on account of their popularity or the popping corks has never been established. In any case, the name itself became so popular that it was officially adopted.

The Pops have flourished from that day to this and have grown in favor with every season. In 1900 the Boston Symphony orchestra left the old Music hall, its original home on Hamilton place, and moved into Symphony hall, its present habitation, which was built especially for the great orchestra in that year. When prohibition came into effect, many thought that the Pops would suffer thereby, but the effect was quite the contrary. The "cafe" end of the Pops has grown instead of diminishing.

At the same time there has come to be considerably more emphasis upon the musical end. Conductor Casella's orchestra now numbers about 80 players, which doubles the size of the original Pops orchestra. These, of course, are of full symphonic proportions, and adequate for an elaborate modern score. The music is now taken somewhat more seriously and quietly, yet the atmosphere of gaiety still prevails. Casella is one of the greatest of living Italian composers; his scores are played at symphony concerts the world over; his ballet "The Jar" was an outstanding success at the Metropolitan Opera house in New York two years ago. His rhapsody "Italia" is a long standing favorite at the Pops. Casella is also Italy's most brilliant pianist, and one of her finest conductors. The Pops under Casella have taken on a new interest and importance.

ine

com-
s Hei-player ked for t it was just as much of an honor to play with them he agreed to do it for $1,000, which, by the way, he turned over to a charity.

His appearance brought a roof-lifting ovation and his solo was cheered. Later, in the green room, over 100 Boston music devotees collected to fawn over him, but when they recognized Mrs. Heifetz (Florence Vidor, the movie star) the very great violinist and the classics were forgotten.

SEE PAGE
184
for MAY 12

N. Y. THIS CLIPPING FROM
TIMES
MAY 12 1929

BOSTON

M[illegible]ed at the May Day opening of the Boston "Pops," concerning which The Boston Herald remarked that 2,600 persons were present to hear eighty-five of Mr. Koussevitzky's players, led for another supplemental term by Alfredo Casella. This event began a forty-fourth season. The fifty-eight nightly concerts to come were estimated to produce a total attendance of 125,000 persons. The Puritan newspaper did not fail to mention "liquid refreshments" at tables set about Symphony Hall.

"Dire predictions," The Herald recalled, "were made for the fate of the 'Pops' until they appeared in their first prohibition début season. The tables were there just like the other days. The crowds came, and many were on hand the first night of the prohibition début, expecting it to be the death knell of the famed musical institution. That was a memorable night just ten years ago. Though wines and beer were missing, the audiences were soon won to the music.

"Soft drinks and refreshments are now served at the same tables. An informal atmosphere permeates the audience, and should any one overlook going to the 'Pops' during a season at least once or more, music circles raise their eyebrows in astonishment."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. TIMES
MAY 12 1929

B. Martinu, the young Czech composer, has completed his opera "The Soldier and the Dancing Girl" and has also finished two other works, a symphony in one movement, written in commemoration of the first French flag given to Czech legionaires in 1917, which Koussevitzky is to perform for the first time next November in Boston, and the other a Jazz Suite for Jazz (Prelude, Blues, Boston, Finale), which was played by H. Steinberg in Prague for the first time last month.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS

ORCHESTRA BALKS

PARIS. — Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was to have conducted the opera "Boris Godunof" at the Paris opera, has broken his contract because members of the orchestra refused to submit to three rehearsals instead of the customary two, it was said today.

New York Telegraph

Paris Orchestra Objects To Three Rehearsals

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is reported to have broken his contract to conduct "Boris Godunoff" at the Paris Opera. Members of the Paris Opera Orchestra declined to rehearse three times instead of the customary two, it was explained.

VARIETY
MAY 22 1929

Operatic Sensation

Paris, May 21.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston orchestra leader, has postponed rehearsals as guest conductor of the Paris Opera, following five special performances of Moussorgsky's opera, "Boris Goudenov." Musicians refused to attend more than two rehearsals.

Incident is the prevailing sensation in private opera circles.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS AMERICA

Believes It Has Most Intense Musical Development in World

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Godunof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreness, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State Orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY LAUDS U. S. MUSICAL PROGRESS

Paris, May 23.—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Godounow" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyreneess, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States", said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian state orchestra, "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth".

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter". He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York city on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

SEES INTENSE MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT IN U. S.

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera, "Boris Goudenof," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVE. UNION
MAY 23 1929

Says U. S. Leads World in Music Appreciation

Koussevitzky, Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sees Phenomenal Musical Renaissance in America.

PARIS, May 23—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Gudonoff," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who, prior to his appointment to the Boston Post, was leader of the Russian State Orcbhestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director and his wife sailed from New York on May 1.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Koussevitsky in Paris might have said more, and surely he could have said less; but what he did say was that America now leads the world in appreciation of music — not bad music but good music.

Boston customs officials may have confused Voltaire with Rabelais. Or, having heard Voltaire called an "atheist," they may have thought that an atheist was a writer of obscenity.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN
EAGLE
APR 26 1929

Ruth Conniston, New York organist, has been chosen by Alfredo Cassella as soloist, in one of his own compositions to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Sunday, [illegible] Boston. During the program, Mr. Cassella, guest conductor, will present and conduct his new Concerto Romano, a work composed in 1926 and inspired by a Bach opus which makes generous use of the trombone.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GAZETTE

The director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in Paris directing five presentations of an opera, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music. He not only believes this, but has the courage to say so in France, where, like other European countries, the feeling is probably not very widespread that the United States can assume a leadership in anything as vital as music. It will give Americans a comfortable feeling to know that such seed is being dropped on foreign soil.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CALL
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
MAY 27 1929

Musical Progress In America

America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who so expressed himself in Paris, and this in spite of the jazz which has played such a prominent part in our musical progress in recent years. Seriously, however, we are inclined to believe that what the great conductor says is true. Music today does play a more prominent part in the life of America than most of us realize.

Other countries lay claim to the majority of the greatest composers of all time, but in the appreciation of the works of these composers and of all composers no people on earth excel those in this country.

Radio, we believe, is largely responsible for the great progress which music has made in this country in recent years, and this country having more radio broadcasting stations and more radio receiving sets than any other nation, it is not surprising that our progress should be much faster and that our appreciation of good music should be manifest.

America has always been a music loving nation. The advent of the radio made it more so. There are today, in the United States homes filled with music which never before heard, within their four walls, the strains of a symphony orchestra , a band, or even a jazz orchestra. The average citizen would, no doubt, be inclined to believe that the best liked music in this modern age is jazz music but investigation by those who arrange programs for broadcasting stations stand ready to dispute any such assertion. It may be that what is commonly referred to as high class music is not so much desired as that which might be called of a medium class, but nevertheless where there is a love for music of any sort and appreciation of any music there is bound to be love for and appreciation of the works of the masters.

America, too, has given birth in the last century to composers whose works have been praised throughout the entire musical world and who have had much to do with the general progress noted in this country by such men as Koussevitzky.

It may be that one will not find the so-called man in the street occupying a seat in the concert hall for a symphony orchestra or some big event in the musical world, but it might be interesting to visit the homes of some of these "men in the street." There one might find such of our citizens listening before inexpensive radio sets to some of these works of the great composers as sent over the air by skilled musicians. Applause for the broadcasting of some of the concerts given by symphony orchestras have come, we are told, from many humble homes.

Love of music is an asset to any nation. Music cheers and comforts the soul. It touches a soft spot in human nature. It has made better men and women. It helps to make better nations. The man or woman who has no love for music is difficult to find. Music today is playing a prominent part in the life of this country and all over the world, more so than many of us believe, perhaps. Good music is one of the best things of life. Those who appreciate music are partaking of one of life's joys; those who fail to appreciate it, fail to get much of the sunshine and joy of life to which all human beings are entitled.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN

MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT

Boston Symphony Director Praises Artistic Advancement of America

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera, "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which, instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth.

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director sailed from New York on May 1. His wife accompanied him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAY 24 1929

RUSSIAN CLAIMS INTENSE MUSICAL DEVELOPMENT HERE

From Yesterday's Latest Edition

PARIS, May 23 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Borsi Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston Post was leader of the Russian state orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perception, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth.

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

The director sailed from New York city on May 1. His wife accompanied him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BULLETIN
NORWICH, CONN.
MAY 24 1929

(2)

Finds U. S. Leads World In Musical Appreciation

Koussevitzky Tells Parisians of "Renaissance" Here

PARIS, May 25 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A prenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian State Orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which, instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as many insist, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America. He eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medium."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
MAY 24

Says U. S. Leads in Love of Music

Koussevitzky Says Great Renaissance Is in Progress.

PARIS, May 23—(AP) Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Gudonoff," before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America has the most intense musical development of any country in the world and leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who, prior to his appointment to the Boston post, was leader of the Russian State Orcbhestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises. The American people have an inordinate genius for growth."

BELIEVES U. S. LEADS IN GOOD MUSIC APPECIATION

PARIS, May 24—(AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston symphony orchestra who is here to direct five presentations of the opera "Boris Goudenof" before starting his summer vacation in the Pyrenees, believes that America leads in appreciation of good music.

"A phenomenal musical renaissance is in progress in the United States," said Mr. Koussevitzky, who prior to his appointment to the Boston post was leader of the Russian state orchestra. "Americans have the active temperament which instead of retarding their artistic perceptions, as is insisted by many, has been the salvation of America's artistic development. They have stimulated orchestral advancement just as they have created immense business enterprises.

Koussevitzky said he found Stravinsky the most outstanding influence in modern music in America and eulogized "America's promising young composers, such as Aaron Copeland, Homer Sessions and Carpenter." He declared American composers "no longer find jazz a suitable medie.

The director sailed from New York city on May 1. His wife accompanied him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAY 26

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT SCHEDULE

Dates for the four Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are more spread out next season than they were last. The series will begin earlier and last later, with the same number of concerts as last year, and in the E. F. Albee Theatre Tuesday nights as usual. The first concert, according to the present arrangement, will be on Nov. 19, and the final one on April 1. Last year the season opened on Dec. 4 and ended March 26. The concerts came once a month. Next season they are scheduled for November, December and January and then a skip to April. The December and January dates for next season are the 17th and 21st, respectively. Subscribers have received the schedule from W. H. Brennan, the manager, and have until June 15 the opportunity to renew their seats for next season.

183

MUSIC

AT THE POPS

The second symphonic program at the Pops concerts attracted an audience that almost filled Symphony hall last night. The main attraction of the evening was undoubtedly Casella's Concerto Romano for organ, trumpets, trombones, kettle-drums, and strings, through Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony and the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" drew many.

Casella's organ concerto, heard for the first time in Boston last night, won most enthusiastic applause. Miss Ruth M. Conniston played the organ. The concerto is a vigorous and original work, making expert use of the organ in ways that reveal its most characteristically beautiful possibilities, as well as new resources that can produce stirring effects. The first movement, sonorous, rich and majestic, rose to moments of passionate intensity and thrilling climax. The slow second movement was fugal, complex and intricate, but pervaded by a churchly exaltation. Very high, reedy designs were traced by the organ against the darkly colored background of celli and double basses. The Cadenza and Toccata riveted attention on unusual effects from the organ. The nobility and rhythmic vigor of the whole concerto culminated in the closing measures, which reached the highest pitch of excitement.

Mr. Casella's conducting, admirable in his own work, was not so well suited to either the Beethoven symphony or the Ravel suite. For the first he seemed not very sympathetic, for the second, without enough interest in nuance . . . the performances were efficient, but a trifle too matter of fact.

The orchestra played especially well on the concerto, and was required to share in the applause with Miss Conniston and the composer. E. B.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EVE. TRIBUNE
JUN 5 - 1929

* * * * *

The ever popular Pops concerts are now in the full swing of their 44th season and night after night capacity audiences are attracted to Symphony hall in Boston by the excellent programs. The orchestra consisting of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra with about 110 musicians under the direction of Alfred Casella comprises one of the finest musical organizations not only in the country but in the world. The origin of the Pops was brought about in an effort to relieve the presentation of the stiffness of the formality and as a continuance of the regular symphony season and its success was so instantaneous and continued that it soon became an established series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TRIBUNE
LAWRENCE, MASS.
(2)
JUN 5 1929

* * * * *

The ever popular Pops concerts are now in the full swing of their 44th season and night after night capacity audiences are attracted to Symphony hall in Boston by the excellent programs. The orchestra consisting of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra with about 110 musicians under the direction of Alfred Casella comprises one of the finest musical organizations not only in the country but in the world. The origin of the Pops was brought about in an effort to relieve the presentation of the stiffness of the formality and as a continuance of the regular symphony season and its success was so instantaneous and continued that it soon became an established series.

* * * * *

Surgeons of [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JUN 5 - 1929

From Boston Transcript.

Serge Koussevitzky says that America leads the world in musical appreciation—a long journey from Yankee Doodle and Pop Goes the Weasel as symbols of American culture.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

THE NORMAL RHYTHM

(From the Boston Globe)

In Paris, M. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, expresses the belief that jazz is diminishing in America. Taking the place being vacated, he finds a phenomenal musical renaissance, which, so he believes, is the most intense musical development of any country in the world.

Such an opinion is rather startling from so high a source, but M. Koussevitzky should be in a position to know whereof he speaks. Perhaps this civilization of ours is becoming more civilized, slackening its speed somewhat and elevating its ideals. However, this does not mean that people generally will soon be humming airs from grand opera on their way to work and discussing classical composers during the lunch hour. There was some disappointment in the experiment of putting operatic stars on the radio, possibly because the expense involved was thought too great for the results obtained. But, even if we are some years short of the cultural millennium, there are signs which point to a reduction in the wildness which has been characteristic of the post-war decade. It should be so. The ten years are up, and it is to be expected that overwrought nerves will relax after a time.

There is growing a disposition to take life more quietly, to put more into it, and a great many people seem to be getting more out of it. Take the present college generation—these young people are working more seriously than their predecessors. They, or some of them, put out comic papers which would be startling if they were not so much alike from the Golden Gate to the other end of Maine. But life in the colleges is utterly unlike the incidents pictured by the campus wits. The level of intellectual achievement has been raised steadily during the past few years, so that it is now in some cases rather harder for young folks to get into college than it was for their fathers and mothers to graduate.

When automobile production began to congest the highways, the booksellers ranged themselves on the mourners' bench, bewailing the lost habit of reading. Since then, the publishers have been putting out millions of copies of English classics, which seems to be a most profitable business. New publications, obviously what is called "heavy reading," are printed in editions several times as large as works of the same character appeared in a few years ago.

The playwriters are another happily disappointed group. Serious plays have been finding amazingly good receptions during recent years. The number of people who dare to take up the pictorial arts of painting and sculpture is growing constantly.

Of course there is plenty of jazz to be found, but the raw noises are not holding their own with good music, as programs on the radio give evidence. The belief is increasing that there is demand for more enduring things.

The jazz age has spread the notion among those who are so young that they have known no other, that all ages were like the decade that has followed the war. If it is possible to undeceive them it will be well. The wildness from which we may be emerging had certain definite causes. In the first place there was the great catastrophe, which held most of the world in its grip for four bloody years. It was as natural to take to jazz as it is for many a person with overstrained nerves to take to drink. And then there has been in this country an enormous increase of wealth with an accompanying increase of leisure. Many new toys were brought into the reach of enormous numbers of people whose noses had formerly been held to the grindstone.

It takes time to learn to use the toys so that they will give pleasure to the users instead of doing them harm. The situation has been much the same as in a large family of children who crowd around a heavily laden tree on Christmas morning. Before dinner, they are exhausted and all the new acquisitions look very much alike. By mid-afternoon, there are tears and hair pullings. Prosperity has been too much for the youngsters. They might have managed it better a little at a time.

So it is with many of us. A furious pace has prevailed and nerves are wracked. It is time that we took our lives more quietly. The swing of the pendulum should be away from jazz in a more sane direction.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
MAY 30 1929

MUSICAL PROGRESS IN AMERICA.

In an interview with a French newspaper representative the other day, Serge Koussewitsky, the eminent director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, asserted that leadership in appreciation of good music, in all its forms and varieties, had passed from Europe to the United States.

Though this may seem to many an extraordinary claim, traveled lovers of music know it is true. The remarkable change has been effected in the last two decades. There are perhaps only two or three orchestras in Europe today that deserve to be placed in the same category with the several first-rate American orchestras. Even the best old-world orchestras cannot achieve the technical and interpretative perfection which is conceded to be characteristic of American performances at their best. And American audiences are conceded to be more critical and more exacting than are those of European music capitals.

These notable and gratifying results are due, of course, to many factors, but the principal one is American generosity. Great orchestras are not self-supporting, and have to be subsidized by governments or private citizens of culture, wealth and public spirit. Without elaborate preparation, thorough rehearsing and painstaking direction, the performances of the best orchestra are mechanical and uninspired. Rehearsals cost money.

American concert and opera audiences demand the best obtainable music regardless of cost, and they are willing to foot the bills, directly or indirectly. The United States is supporting at least ten symphony orchestras and several opera companies. The summer season of opera at Ravinia park, near Chicago, for example, is the wonder of European visitors.

The time has come for the United States to mobilize its musical resources and organize annual music festivals on the model of Salzburg and Munich. It has the artists, the auditors and the means to make such festivals brilliantly successful.

THAT QUESTIONA[illegible]

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAY 12 1929

THE PUBLIC'S CHOICE

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

WHAT music does a symphony concert audience prefer to hear? What, from the point of view of the listener, is "a good program"? Setting aside the matter of skillful arrangement—the art of the program-maker in providing contrast, balance, variety, etc., and considering only the musical raw material itself—it may as well be said at once that there is no such thing as "a good program." There is the sort of program that the Right Wing prefers. There is the sort of program that the Left Wing prefers. There is the sort of program that the Center prefers. They are all different. No one program or type of program will please a body of concert subscribers as a whole; and for any conductor who should be naïve enough or daring enough to attempt so impossible a contrivance there would be but a choice of unpleasant outcomes—madness or resignation.

If you doubt this proposition, go to a Philadelphia Orchestra concert and listen to the comments of the Left Wing among the audience (say the friends and adherents of Mr. Varese) upon a program or that part of a program which Mr. Stokowski may trustfully have devised to placate the embattled dowagers of the Right Wing—or, if you prefer, reverse the process.

* * *

Two Letters of Protest

IN THE managerial office of a certain great American symphony orchestra there are on file two letters of complaint signed by two groups of subscribers. One of the letters reads as follows:

"To the Board of Directors of the ————.

Gentlemen: We, the undersigned subscribers for many years to the ———— Concerts, wish to register our protest against the programs offered by Mr. [the Conductor]. Owing to the predominance of modern music upon these programs, to the exclusion of the great masters, the pleasure and satisfaction which we have derived from the concerts in other seasons have vanished. We urgently request a return to Schumann, Liszt, Dvorak, Tchaikovsky, Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn. We feel that the constant production of modernistic works is unworthy of the great ———— Orchestra. Inquiry among other patrons reveals widespread dissatisfaction with the present programs.

[Here follows an impressive list of signatures.]

* * *

The other letter reads as follows:

To the Board of Directors of the ————.

Dears Sirs: We should like to know how much longer Mr. [the Conductor of the Orchestra] is to be encouraged to place upon his programs such ancient and spavined warhorses as Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," the "Oberon" Overture, "Les Préludes," Beethoven's Fifth, the "Fingal's Cave" Overture, and Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, when he might be adding instead to the list of outstanding modern works as yet unperformed by the ————, Orchestra. We, the undersigned, want to hear more of the voices of the living age, the musical expressions of our own time, and fewer of the hackneyed standbys which (let us not forget!) were once novelties, disturbing to the grandparents of those who are now disturbed by Honegger and Bartok and Stravinsky. Is it not time that Liszt, Dvorak, Tchaikovsky & Co. were given a rest for a while?

Mr. ———— should not be deceived by the applause of the stand-patters among his audiences, and ignore the presence among them of many music lovers who are sick to death of the chestnuts of the standard repertoire and long for more of the music of our own time, of which Mr. ———— has given us too little.

[Here follows another list of signatures, shorter than the first and considerably less imposing.]

* * *

What Shall the Conductor Do?

NATURALLY, the conductor—assuming that he has, as he should have, the deciding voice in the matter—will try to hold a tactful balance between the familiar works that the Right Wing loves and the novel works that the Left Wing demands; with the inevitable result of giving pain to that section of the audience for whom the opposition's meat is poison.

Two conductors—Mr. Stokowski and Mr. Koussevitzky—at the close of the season just past, took the trouble to ascertain the preferences of their audiences by the ancient, rough-and-ready, but always rewarding procedure of a voting contest. Each conductor promised a final "request program," to be chosen by the ballots of the subscribers.

The custom is one of long standing in Philadelphia, though it was dropped last year while Mr. Stokowski was away on leave of absence. In Boston the expedient, we believe, was unprecedented in the history of the Symphony concerts. It was also, in the case of the New England orchestra, less significant in result, since the voters were restricted in their choice to works played during the last season under Mr. Koussevitzky. In Philadelphia, the subscribers were more wisely permitted to select their favorites "from any works in the orchestral repertory."

Let us therefore glance at the results of the contest in Philadelphia, as indicative of the tastes of a representative American symphony audience familiar (theoretically) with the entire standard orchestral repertoire, from Bach to Prokofieff. Let us also, for purposes of comparison, recall the outcome of the voting in the four previous seasons in which the contests were held. This will take us back over a period of four years, beginning with the close of the season of 1924-'25, and omitting the season of 1927-'28, when no contest was held.

* * *

Philadelphia's Favorites

THE voting was for three types of work: a Symphony, an Overture, and a "Miscellaneous Number": which, with striking liberality, was intended to comprise tone-poems, suites, symphonic preludes, operatic excerpts—anything, in short, that wasn't unmistakably a Symphony or an Overture. As a matter of fact, this category made room, in the voting, for such fantastically diverse items as Bach's "Passacaglia," the "Blue Danube" Waltz, Siegfried's Funeral March, and Mr. George Gershwin's jazz opera, "135th Street."

Confining ourselves to summaries, we discover that the six most popular symphonies, the six most popular overtures, and the six most popular "miscellaneous numbers," as chosen by the audiences of the Philadelphia Orchestra in contests held during the last four years, are as follows:

THE SIX MOST POPULAR SYMPHONIES

COMPOSER.	WORK.	Total No. of Votes in 4 Contests.
Franck	Symphony in D Minor	742
Beethoven	No. 5, C Minor	643
Tchaikovsky	No. 5, E Minor	463
Tchaikovsky	No. 6 ("Pathetic")	419
Brahms	No. 1, C Minor	394
Dvorak	No. 5, ("New World")	322

THE SIX MOST POPULAR OVERTURES

Wagner	To "Die Meistersinger"	517
Beethoven	To "Leonore," No. 3	488
Wagner	To "Tannhaeuser"	443
Wagner	To "Tristan"*	295
Wagner	To "Lohengrin"	250
Wagner	To "Rienzi"	224

*In performances by the Philadelphia Orchestra, the "Tristan" Prelude is always linked with the Liebestod."

THE SIX MOST POPULAR "MISCELLANEOUS NUMBERS"

Rimsky-Korsakoff	"Scheherazade"	455
Tchaikovsky	"Romeo and Juliet"	290
Bach	"Passacaglia"	271
Strauss	"Tod und Verklärung"	270
Sibelius	"Finlandia"	263
Debussy	"L'Apres-Midi d'un Faune"	221

* * *

The Winning Six

FROM this it appears that the six composers most tenderly enshrined in the hearts of symphonic Philadelphia are, in order, these: Wagner (totaling 1,729 votes for five works); Tchaikovsky (1,172 votes for three works); Beethoven (1,131 votes for two works); Franck (742 votes for one work); Rimsky-Korsakoff (455 votes for one work); Brahms (394 votes for one work).

But although Wagner wins hands down as Philadelphia's favorite composer, the Quaker City's favorite work was not composed by Wagner, but by César Franck: a greater number of votes were cast for the Symphony in D minor than for any other item in the list.

* * *

On the whole, it is a choice that we may all take pride in. Of the favorite six composers, two are among the high gods of music; one is a half-god (at the very least); the three others are (shall we say?) second rate, with a possible third rate among them. Half of the Symphonies and Overtures are works of genius. The "miscellaneous" winners do not make so brave a showing; yet the mountainous "Passacaglia" of Bach is among them, and the loveliest inspiration in orchestral music since the death of Brahms—even though it is at the foot of the list.

At least we can say that of the eighteen chosen works only two are musical shoddy. We need not name them; and perhaps in another four years, Philadelphia may have foresworn them, and we shall be throwing our new spring hats in the air to celebrate a choice 100 per cent pure and undefiled.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

1860.

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

1880.

4 189

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
SEP 1 - 1928

IN FORECAST FOR NEXT MUSIC SEASON

GEORGE FLEMING HOUSTON, BASS BARITONE, ENGAGED BY PHILADELPHIA OPERA CO.

TAMAKI MIURA, JAPANESE SOPRANO CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, OCT 7.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, DOUBLE-BASS PLAYER, CARNEGIE HALL, OCT. 23.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
SEP 1 - 1928

Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first New York appearance as a double-bass soloist at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23. He will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, performer on the viol d'amour.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD
SEP 2 - 1928

Gretchaninoff To Arrive Here Early in 1929

Appears With Mme. Koshetz on Jan. 19; Koussevitzky's Bass Recital October 23

Arrangements have been completed for Alexander Gretchaninoff, Russian composer and conductor, to come to this country next January, Richard Copley announces. He will conduct concerts of his own works and appear with Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano, in programs of his songs. His first concert with Mme. Koshetz will be in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, January 19. Mme. Koshetz arrives here in the latter part of October to sing with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia on October 26, 27 and 29. Her first recital of the season will be in Carnegie Hall on Monday night, November 19.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give his first recital here on the double-bass at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, October 23. He will also play this instrument, on which he became noted as a virtuoso before gaining conductorial fame, in Boston. In both recitals he will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, playing the viola d'amore. The Society of Ancient Instruments of Paris, founded by Mr. Casadesus in 1901, will return here in January, make public and private appearances in New York and travel as far West as Chicago.

Another group which will appear next season under Mr. Copley's management is the Swastika Quartet, a new organization from the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, which has been drilled by Louis Bailly. It will play in New York, Washington and Philadelphia. The Curtis Institute will also send its orchestra of 110 players here for a Carnegie Hall concert. The orchestra, which was first conducted by Leopold Stokowski and later by Dr. Artur Rodzinski, will also give two public concerts in Philadelphia and one in Washington.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
SEP 3 - 1928

GUNN PROPOSES GIANT MUSICAL FEAST FOR FAIR

Would Build Auditorium Seating 6,000; Suggests Symphony and Song Concerts.

Huge musical presentations, featuring American artists, and held in an especially constructed open air auditorium with a seating capacity of 6,000 or more, were the feature points in the music plan submitted to the trustees of the World's Fair of 1933 by Glenn Dillard Gunn, music critic of The Herald and Examiner.

According to Mr. Gunn's plans, the program of the fair would include:

Ten weeks of music by the United States marine band; ten weeks of opera by the Chicago Civic Opera Company; ten weeks of concerts by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with concert series also by the Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies.

CHORUS SINGING.

Singing by the amalgamated choruses of Chicago, 2,000 voices; a Welsh Esteddfod, 2,000 voices, and various racial groups, 1,000 voices.

Besides the auditorium for the symphony and choral concerts, Mr. Gunn suggests the erection of an open air stage for opera, modeled after Ravinia, and seating 4,000.

His plan also includes the construction of a band stand and shell for free out-door concerts.

EMPHASIZE CHICAGO.

"The musical program should emphasize Chicago organizations—the Civic Opera, the Chicago Symphony, the local choruses which should serve singly and in amalgamation," said Mr. Gunn in outlining his plan.

"The musical program should underscore native music. Prizes should be offered for American operas, symphonies, choral works, chamber music and lesser compositions.

"There should also be a comprehensive exhibition in concert form showing the astounding musical resources of the nation as represented in the music of the public schools. The National High School Orchestra, band and chorus together with similar organizations representing the city and the state should be included in the concert program.

"The fair should write musical conventions of all kinds. The Federated Music Clubs, 100,000 strong; the United German Chorus, 5,000 strong, and other racial groups. All should be required to emphasize American music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 8 - 1928

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes with the Boston Symphony orchestra October 30 to open the symphony series, has been creating a sensation again this summer with his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and with his appearances, solo and with orchestra, at other Continental centers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM UNDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

SEP 9 - 1928

THIS season concerts will be given Friday evenings instead of Thursday, as in the past. There will be two exceptions to this rule. In order to obtain the New York Philharmonic with Toscanini and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was necessary to accept a date that fits in with their tours. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard Monday evening, October 29, and the New York Philharmonic Thursday, March 7.

The concerts are divided into two series of seven each, and the prices for the series have been scaled at a figure that barely covers the cost of the attractions with every seat sold. In proportion to the number of concerts, prices are lower than last year.

It is expected that the extraordinary excellence of the offerings will insure a series subscription that will exhaust the seating capacity of the house and that there will be few or no seats available for the single concerts.

If purchased in series the best seats in the orchestra may be had for as low as $1.78 a concert, and in the balcony for as low as $1. These prices to hear artists of the caliber included in the two series and in an environment like the Eastman Theater are said to be unduplicated in the country.

Mail orders are now being accepted for one or both series. Box office sale of series tickets opens Monday, September 24.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 9 - 1928

◈ ◈ ◈

New Yorkers are to hear Serge Koussevitzky play his double bass, a recital by the Boston Symphony's conductor being announced for Oct. 23 in Carnegia Hall. He will be assisted by Henri Casadesus whose instrument is the viola d'amore. Mr. Koussevitzky is also to give a recital in Bost

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
Herald

MUSIC CENTER TO LAND IN AMERICA

Famous Boston Director Predicts Great Future in This Country.

PARIS, Sept. 7.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich adn the highly educated that are crowding the concert hall, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy the— wonderful."

THIS CLIPPING FROM NDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

CO

SEP 9 - 1928

Serge with th on Oct phony sensatio concerts with his orchestra ters.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER

SEP 14 1928

alented conductor of the ill bring that organization October 29. Mr. Koussevit- t talented conductors now

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVE. POST
SEP 12 1928

Music

Schubert Prize Symphony to be Played Here in November

KURT ATTERBURG'S $10,000 prize-winning symphony of the Schubert centennial contest will be played during Schubert Week, November 18 to 25, in New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Willem Mengelberg. Other performances are under negotiation by the Columbia Phonograph Society and by the Boston, Philadelphia and Detroit Symphony orchestras.

The Roth String Quartet, brought over by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, has arrived here and will play in Pittsfield, Mass., next week and later in Washington, Boston, Cambridge, Wellesley, Williamstown and in this city. The players are Feri Roth, first violin; Jeno Antal, second violin; Ferenc Molsar, viola; Albert Van Doorn, cello.

The Sunday matinee and night concert season at the Gallo Theatre opens October 21. The regular season opens October 8 with Philip Goodman's production of "The Rainbow," and the San Carlo Opera Company will be heard there later.

A new edition of Who's Who in Music will appear this year. The editor is Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, and among the associate editors are William J. Henderson, Lawrence Gilman, Leonard ebling, George Gartlaw, Glen Dillard nn and Maurice Rosenfeld. Among important contributors will be ter Damrosch.

uis Wamure is going to stick by determination to become a tenor ad of a baritone and will make eratic debut in America with the lelphia Grand Opera Company eason, singing Don Jose in en."

announcements by Beck and re: November 20, Town ovinsky, pianist, and Hall, Felix Salmond.

Local Symphony Carries On as Others Fail

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN.

THE management of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra sends news of the subscription sale that should be encouraging to all lovers of music in its higher forms. Eighty-five per cent of all seats for the Friday, Saturday and Tuesday concerts have been subscribed at slightly advanced prices.

The long negotiations with the musicians' union have delayed the rather complicated business of subscription renewals this season, and many who intend to retain their holdings will be surprised to learn that Saturday is the last day of grace. On Monday, September 17, all seats not subscribed for will be on sale to the general public.

These are not many. The Friday matinees are entirely sold out by subscription. There are only a few good seats left for the Tuesday matinees and, for the Saturday evening concerts, not more than 200 desirable locations can be offered.

* * *

THE Chicago Symphony holds its public. The same cannot be said of the orchestras in other cities, Boston and Philadelphia excepted. The famous New York Symphony, which Walter Damrosch has made famous by way of the radio, gave its last concert on August 18 at Chautauqua, N. Y. Despite the fact that hundreds of thousands heard this famous body each week—and heard, too, Mr. Damrosch's illuminating discussions of symphonic music—it has become impossible to maintain it as an independent orchestra giving a series of symphony concerts in New York City. So it has merged with the New York Philharmonic.

The St. Louis Symphony has played to a deficit again, despite the revenue derived from the weekly broadcast of the program. The Minneapolis Symphony has discontinued all popular concerts, once the most flourishing department of its activities, and substituted a series of radio concerts for the coming season. But the Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago symphonies rarely are heard on the air and they retain their hold upon the concert-going public.

* * *

THE German Theater, at Victoria, Sheffield and Belmont avs., under management of Rudolf Bach, will inaugurate a four weeks' season Saturday, September 22.

Adolf Philipp, playwright, actor, composer and famous as the creator of the German-American musical comedy, will offer a series of his studies in pre-war German types. His comedy, "Ueber'n grossen Teich" ("Across the Big Pond") displays the corner grocer, his friend the butcher and their friend, the old-time German saloonkeeper, as its heroes. It should strike a responsive note in many hearts.

1 189

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
SEP 1 - 1928

IN FORECAST FOR NEXT MUSIC SEASON

GEORGE FLEMING HOUSTON, BASS BARITONE, ENGAGED BY PHILADELPHIA OPERA CO.

TAMAKI MIURA, JAPANESE SOPRANO CIVIC REPERTORY THEATRE, OCT 7.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY DOUBLE BASS PLAYER, CARNEGIE HALL, OCT. 23.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
SEP 1 - 1928

Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his first New York appearance as a double-bass soloist at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 23. He will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, performer on the viol d'amour.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD
SEP 2 - 1928

Gretchaninoff To Arrive Here Early in 1929

Appears With Mme. Koshetz on Jan. 19; Koussevitzky's Bass Recital October 23

Arrangements have been completed for Alexander Gretchaninoff, Russian composer and conductor, to come to this country next January, Richard Copley announces. He will conduct concerts of his own works and appear with Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano, in programs of his songs. His first concert with Mme. Koshetz will be in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, January 19. Mme. Koshetz arrives here in the latter part of October to sing with the Philadelphia Orchestra in Philadelphia on October 26, 27 and 29. Her first recital of the season will be in Carnegie Hall on Monday night, November 19.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give his first recital here on the double-bass at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday night, October 23. He will also play this instrument, on which he became noted as a virtuose before gaining conductorial fame, in Boston. In both recitals he will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, playing the viola d'amore. The Society of Ancient Instruments of Paris, founded by Mr. Casadesus in 1901, will return here in January, make public and private appearances in New York and travel as far West as Chicago.

Another group which will appear next season under Mr. Copley's management is the Swastika Quartet, a new organization from the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, which has been drilled by Louis Bailly. It will play in New York, Washington and Philadelphia. The Curtis Institute will also send its orchestra of 110 players here for a Carnegie Hall concert. The orchestra, which was first conducted by Leopold Stokowski and later by Dr. Artur Rodzinski, will also give two public concerts in Philadelphia and one in Washington.

CHICAGO, ILL.
HERALD EXAMINER
SEP 3 - 1928

GUNN PROPOSES GIANT MUSICAL FEAST FOR FAIR

Would Build Auditorium Seating 6,000; Suggests Symphony and Song Concerts.

Huge musical presentations, featuring American artists, and held in an especially constructed open air auditorium with a seating capacity of 6,000 or more, were the feature points in the music plan submitted to the trustees of the World's Fair of 1933 by Glenn Dillard Gunn, music critic of The Herald and Examiner.

According to Mr. Gunn's plans, the program of the fair would include:

Ten weeks of music by the United States marine band; ten weeks of opera by the Chicago Civic Opera Company; ten weeks of concerts by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with concert series also by the Philadelphia and Boston Symphonies.

CHORUS SINGING.

Singing by the amalgamated choruses of Chicago, 2,000 voices; a Welsh Esteddfod, 2,000 voices, and various racial groups, 1,000 voices.

Besides the auditorium for the symphony and choral concerts, Mr. Gunn suggests the erection of an open air stage for opera, modeled after Ravinia, and seating 4,000.

His plan also includes the construction of a band stand and shell for free out-door concerts.

EMPHASIZE CHICAGO.

"The musical program should emphasize Chicago organizations—the Civic Opera, the Chicago Symphony, the local choruses which should serve singly and in amalgamation," said Mr. Gunn in outlining his plan.

"The musical program should underscore native music. Prizes should be offered for American operas, symphonies, choral works, chamber music and lesser compositions.

"There should also be a comprehensive exhibition in concert form showing the astounding musical resources of the nation as represented in the music of the public schools. The National High School Orchestra, band and chorus together with similar organizations representing the city and the state should be included in the concert program.

"The fair should write musical conventions of all kinds. The Federated Music Clubs, 100,000 strong; the United German Chorus, 5,000 strong, and other racial groups. All should be required to emphasize American music."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 8 - 1928

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes with the Boston Symphony orchestra October 30 to open the symphony series, has been creating a sensation again this summer with his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and with his appearances, solo and with orchestra, at other Continental centers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SUNDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
SEP 9 - 1928

THIS season concerts will be given Friday evenings instead of Thursday, as in the past. There will be two exceptions to the rule. In order to obtain the New York Philharmonic with Toscanini and the Boston Symphony Orchestra it was necessary to accept a date that fits in with their tours. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard Monday evening, October 29, and the New York Philharmonic Thursday, March 7.

The concerts are divided into two series of seven each, and the prices for the series have been scaled at a figure that barely covers the cost of the attractions with every seat sold. In proportion to the number of concerts, prices are lower than last year.

It is expected that the extraordinary excellence of the offerings will insure a series subscription that will exhaust the seating capacity of the house and that there will be few or no seats available for the single concerts.

If purchased in series the best seats in the orchestra may be had for as low as $1.78 a concert, and in the balcony for as low as $1. These prices to hear artists of the caliber included in the two series and in an environment like the Eastman Theater are said to be unduplicated in the country.

Mail orders are now being accepted for one or both series. Box office sale of series tickets opens Monday, September 24.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 9 - 1928

◈ ◈ ◈

New Yorkers are to hear Serge Koussevitzky play his double bass, a recital by the Boston Symphony's conductor being announced for Oct. 23 in Carnegia Hall. He will be assisted by Henri Casadesus whose instrument is the viola d'amore. Mr. Koussevitzky is also to give a recital in Bos[illegible]

DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
Herald

MUSIC CENTER TO LAND IN AMERICA

Famous Boston Director Predicts Great Future in This Country.

PARIS, Sept. 7.—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

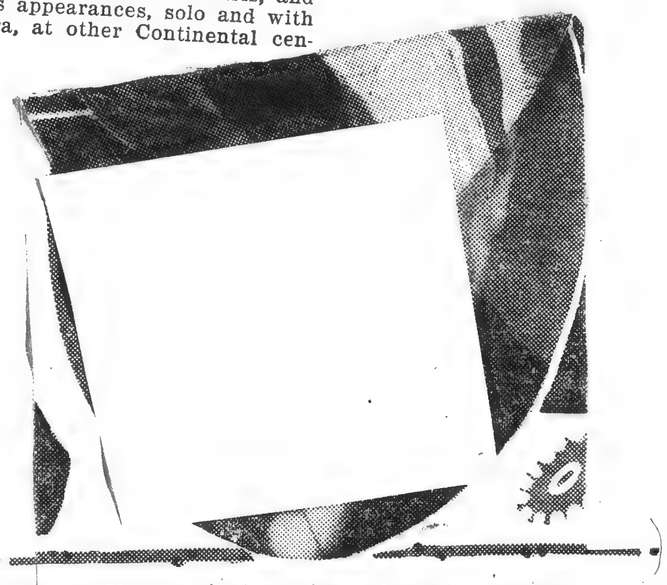
Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich adn the highly educated that are crowding the concert hall, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
SEP 9 - 1928

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on October 30th to open the symphony series, has been creating a sensation again this summer with his concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, and with his appearances, solo and with orchestra, at other Continental centers.



Serge Koussevitzky, the talented conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will bring that organization to the Eastman on the night of October 29. Mr. Koussevitsky is known as one of the most talented conductors now before the public.

THE management of the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra sends news of the subscription sale that should be encouraging to all lovers of music in its higher forms. Eighty-five per cent of all seats for the Friday, Saturday and Tuesday concerts have been subscribed at slightly advanced prices.

The long negotiations with the musicians' union have delayed the rather complicated business of subscription renewals this season, and many who intend to retain their holdings will be surprised to learn that Saturday is the last day of grace. On Monday, September 17, all seats not subscribed for will be on sale to the general public.

These are not many. The Friday matinees are entirely sold out by subscription. There are only a few good seats left for the Tuesday matinees and, for the Saturday evening concerts, not more than 200 desirable locations can be offered.

* * *

THE Chicago Symphony holds its public. The same cannot be said of the orchestras in other cities, Boston and Philadelphia excepted. The famous New York Symphony, which Walter Damrosch has made famous by way of the radio, gave its last concert on August 18 at Chautauqua, N. Y. Despite the fact that hundreds of thousands heard this famous body each week—and heard, too, Mr. Damrosch's illuminating discussions of symphonic music—it has become impossible to maintain it as an independent orchestra giving a series of symphony concerts in New York City. So it has merged with the New York Philharmonic.

The St. Louis Symphony has played to a deficit again, despite the revenue derived from the weekly broadcast of the program. The Minneapolis Symphony has discontinued all popular concerts, once the most flourishing department of its activities, and substituted a series of radio concerts for the coming season. But the Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago symphonies rarely are heard on the air and they retain their hold upon the concert-going public.

* * *

THE German Theater, at Victoria, Sheffield and Belmont avs., under management of Rudolf Bach, will inaugurate a four weeks' season Saturday, September 22.

Adolf Philipp, playwright, actor, composer and famous as the creator of the German-American musical comedy, will offer a series of his studies in pre-war German types. His comedy, "Ueber'n grossen Teich" ("Across the Big Pond") displays the corner grocer, his friend the butcher and their friend, the old-time German saloonkeeper, as its heroes. It should strike a responsive note in many hearts.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVE. POST
SEP 12 1928

Music

Schubert Prize Symphony to be Played Here in November

KURT ATTERBURG'S $10,000 prize-winning symphony of the Schubert centennial contest will be played during Schubert Week, November 18 to 25, in New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Willem Mengelberg. Other performances are under negotiation by the Columbia Phonograph Society and by the Boston, Philadelphia and Detroit Symphony orchestras.

The Roth String Quartet, brought over by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, has arrived here and will play in Pittsfield, Mass., next week and later in Washington, Boston, Cambridge, Wellesley, Williamstown and in this city. The players are Feri Roth, first violin; Jeno Antal, second violin; Ferenc Molsar, viola; Albert Van Doorn, cello.

The Sunday matinee and night concert season at the Gallo Theatre opens October 21. The regular season opens October 8 with Philip Goodman's production of "The Rainbow," and the San Carlo Opera Company will be heard there later.

A new edition of Who's Who in Music will appear this year. The editor is Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, and among the associate editors are William J. Henderson, Lawrence Gilman, Leonard Liebling, George Gartlaw, Glen Dillard Dunn and Maurice Rosenfeld. Among the important contributors will be Walter Damrosch.

Louis Wamure is going to stick by his determination to become a tenor instead of a baritone and will make his operatic debut in America with the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company next season, singing Don Jose in "Carmen."

Recital announcements by Beck and Macfarlane are: November 20, Town Hall, Anton Rovinsky, pianist, and March 17, Town Hall, Felix Salmond, cello.

ny Carries Others Fail

LARD GUNN.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

SEP 15 1928

theatergoers.

The Boston Symphony.

Richmond is to be the only city south of Washington to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, and although it will not appear before January 29, about 1,000 reservations have already been made at the box office at Walter D. Moses and Company, it was announced yesterday. This great American orchestra, with its 112 musicians led by Serge Koussevitsky, is one of the attractions of the artists' series of five concerts to be presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, who say they have arranged even a more imposing course for this season than that which they gave last year.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

SEP 16 192

BOGUE-LA BERGE FORECASTS

The Bogue-Laberge Concert Bureau has prepared a statement for The Morning Telegraph concerning its plans for the season, including some very "newsy" bits.

"This bureau always presents at least one novelty during the course of a season. This year we are bringing over the Royal Belgian Guards' Band, which consists of seventy-one members, including the director. This band is particularly interesting because its personnel includes players of string instruments as well as wind instruments. They are more than a 'band' in the American sense of the word as they are what the French would call a 'harmonie.' There is no English equivalent of this word, but it is best described as a combination of band and orchestra.

"Their tour is being arranged under the patronage of His Majesty, King Albert, and of Prince Albert de Ligne, the Belgian Ambassador to the United States. Special permission for this tour was granted to this bureau by the Belgian Government and military authorities. This promises to be a 'hit' of the concert season.

"Pro Arte String Quartet of Brussels will return to America next January for their third American tour. The success of their last two years here is being proven by the number of engagements we have already secured for them. The critics have spoken of this quartet as having no equal today. In Europe their reputation has long been established and America was not long in appreciating their art.

"Arthur Honegger, composer-conductor, will come to America next January for his first American tour. He will be accompanied by his wife, Andree Vaurabourg, who is a splendid pianist. Mr. Honegger is already booked to conduct the Boston Symphony and the Beethoven Symphony, while his wife will appear as soloist at these concerts. They will appear before a number of the other orchestras and will also give a series of chamber music concerts. These latter will prove vastly interesting, due to the versatility of Mr. Honegger, for not only does he write music which he conducts, but he also displays his talent on the piano and violin.

"Cobina Wright, soprano, has recently come under our management. She is a prominent society leader and also is known as a music critic. Madame Wright has been chosen to accompany Arthur Honegger on his tour as the interpreter of his songs. She will prove an added attraction for the chamber music concerts in which Mr. and Madame Honegger will participate.

"Dr. Leigh Henry, the eminent English writer-lecturer-composer, will come to America in October for his first American tour. He is well known in British literary circles and also is a connoisseur of the stage. He is a recognized authority on Welsh and Celtic music and is a member of the executive board of the Welsh Eisteddfods. At a concert the Royal Welsh Ladies' Choir recently gave for King George and Queen Mary, Dr. Henry was warmly received and congratulated by the royal family. During the course of his tour in America, he will appear before a number of the prominent colleges and universities. Dr. Henry is also the London correspondent for Musical America.

Meet the Maestro

(Continued from Page 6.)

Milan, Italy, where he is well known as impresario. He is planning to present pupils in Dayton and on tour.

* * *

Arnold Powell, who came to the United States in 1918 and settled in Chicago, for the last six years he has been a resident of New York and is established in the Steinway Building as a teacher of the violin and all theoretical subjects, such as harmony, counterpoint, canon, fugue, composition and orchestration.

As a composer Mr. Powell has achieved signal success. He has just completed a choral and grand fugue, scored for large orchestra, which will be performed by one of the orchestral associations this season. The fugue is highly polyphonic in treatment, a dominant characteristic with the composer. The influence of Brahms is seen in his theme development, and his instrumentation is of the most modern order. He has also written several choral works, such as cantatas with orchestra, two sonatas for piano, a string quartet and many songs and smaller pieces for piano and violin. At present he is at work on a symphony.

Powell was born in the city of Vilna, Russia. At the age of 6 years he commenced the study of the violin with local teachers. Two years later he was accepted as a pupil in the Vilna Royal Music School, where he studied under Professor Malkin, who was also the teacher of Jascha Heifetz. After graduation from the Vilna Royal Music School in 1898 with highest honors, young Powell was taken to Moscow to continue the study of the violin under Professor Hrimaly, widely known as the compiler of the work, "Scale for the Violin." At the same conservatory he commenced the study of the piano.

After completing his studies under Professor Hrimaly, Mr. Powell went to St. Petersburg, where he studied musical theory, harmony, counterpoint and orchestration with Alexander Glazounow, at that time dean of Russian composers. The study of canon, fugue and musical form composition was pursued under the celebrated Russian composer, Anatole Liadoff. Later Powell went to Germany, where he became a pupil in violin of the famous August Wilhelmj, and in composition of the eminent German musical scholar, Dr. Hugo Rieman.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy this season, beginning Friday evening, Nov. 23. Mr. Koussevitzky sailed from Europe Sept. 19 and will assemble the orchestra for its first rehearsals the last of the month.

NEW YORK TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky was to sail last Wednesday from Europe to begin his fifth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens its forty-eighth season at Symphony Hall on Oct. 5.

LANCASTER, PA.
NEWS

SEP 16 1928

AMERICA TO BE CENTER FOR WORLD MUSIC, SAYS FAMOUS BOSTON DIRECTOR

Paris—America will be the future great center of music, according to Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has recently given a series of concerts in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky surprised the French musical leaders when he told them that a large number of Americans are now writing the music of the future and that there is no country in the world where good music is better appreciated.

"One doesn't want music, but bread, when one is hungry," said the Director, "and of course everyone knows that America isn't starving these days—only starving for beauty in all its forms. She is now ready for the inner culture, having acquired the outer with prosperity.

"It is almost phenomenal, the great interest that is shown in music. And it is not only the rich and the highly-educated that are crowding the concert-halls, but the ordinary large masses. Even twenty large, fine symphony orchestras cannot satisfy them. It is wonderful."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

SEP 19

KOUSSEVITZKY TO PLAY BULL FIDDLE AS RECITALIST

By IRVING WEIL.

The bull fiddle, more politely known as the contrabass viol, or double bass, is ordinarily, in spite of its hulking size, the most unassuming instrument of the modern orchestra. But now and then some particularly skillful player discovers that it can be made to do more than merely grunt resignedly, and drags it to the front of the stage for solo honors.

It has long been reported that Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, can do marvelous things with the contrabass, but in the four years or more that he has been in America, no one has ever heard him do it. Now, at last, he has been persuaded to give two recitals on the instrument, and one of them will take place here in New York next month. The other will be given in Boston.

Mr. Koussevitzky was the most famous double bass player in Europe before he took up conducting in a serious way. He gave recitals on the instrument up and down Russia for years, and cities in other parts of Europe heard him, too. But his reputation—and engagements—as an orchestral conductor outgrew his activities as a contrabassist, and for the last fifteen years or so he hasn't done much with the bull fiddle.

OTHER SOLOISTS.

It will be extremely interesting to hear him, for there are really a good many potentialities in the contrabass that one would scarcely suspect from listening to the nine or ten players of the thing in any orchestra. In the last ten or fifteen years we have heard two or three soloists on the contrabass who could make it do almost as much as a 'cello.

The soloists, to be sure, always have cheated a little, insofar as they make use of an instrument smaller than the regulation contrabass, something between a 'cello and the full-size affair. This was so as long ago as the time of the Venetian, Dragonetti, probably the most famous of all contrabassists, who astonished the whole of Europe in the eighteenth century. It was also true of Bottesini, the Lombard, the best known of bassists in the middle nineteenth century. We do not actually know what size instrument Mr. Koussevitzky uses now, but we have been told that he, too, formerly employed one something appreciably less than the normal six feet, six inches.

The contrabass viol, it might be interesting to the more curious concertgoer to know, by the way, is the last survival of a family of instruments that, up to the eighteenth century, made up practically the whole orchestra.

UNLIKE RELATIVES.

If you will take the trouble to notice, during an intermission at an orchestral concert, when the hard-working bassists have stood their big viols up against the rear wall, or leaned them against chairs, you will observe that they have flat backs and sloping shoulders (the viols, of course).

This is quite unlike the arched back and square shoulder of the violin, viola and 'cello. The truth is that when the violin family, with its generally more powerful and finer quality tone began to be made in the eighteenth century, it quickly drove out of use all the smaller viols and left only the biggest one. This, with modifications, seemed to do very well for its modest purpose in the orchestra—chiefly that of doubling bass parts.

Another old instrument, the viola d'amore, a kind of small 'cello with seven gut strings and beneath them, seven metal strings which, however, are never touched by the bow, will be used at Mr. Koussevitzky's concert. This will be played by Henri Casadesus, the head of the Society of Ancient Instruments of Paris. The metal strings sound sympathetically when the gut strings are bowed and the tone, although small, is peculiarly charming.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION

SEP 19

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Commences 1928-1929 Season on Oct. 5.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin the annual series of five Brooklyn concerts at the Academy of Music on Nov. 23, opens its forty-eighth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 5. Serge Koussevitzky will then begin his fifth year as conductor of this famous organization.

During the past summer, Mr. Koussevitzky has been in Europe listening to new music and interviewing comopsers and publishers, with no doubt his usual intuitive perception of what is most vital and significant in the music of the present day. The masterpieces of the past will, however, have their just predominance upon his programmes this season, including a Schubert centennial series.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD

Serge Koussevitzky is on his way from Europe to begin rehearsals for the forty-eighth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, October 5. This orchestra's forty-third New York season will consist of the usual Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall on November 22 and 24, January 3 and 5, January 31 and February 2, March 7 and 9 and April 11 and 13, and Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on November 23, January 4, February 1, March 8 and April 12.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD

Interesting

Gretchaninoff, Noted Russian Composer to Present Program of Works

Koussevitzky to Make First Appearance Here as Double-Bass Soloist

By Richard L. Stokes

THE recital season of 1928-29, which will be formally opened with Miss Esther Dale's program at Town Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 2, promises several interesting novelties in addition to the usual torrent of standard events. Foremost among these will be perhaps the American visit of Alexander Gretchaninoff, celebrated Russian composer, who on Jan. 19, at Carnegie Hall, will present a program of his own works, with Mme. Nina Koshetz, soprano, as assisting artist.

Another advent of keen interest will be the first New York appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as a soloist on the double-bass, an instrument familiarly known as the "dog-house." Before undertaking his distinguished career with the baton, Mr. Koussevitzky was a redoutable virtuoso on the bass viol. His concert will take place at Carnegie Hall on Oct. 23.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

SEP 22

A RECITAL of unusual interest announced for Carnegie Hall, New York City, will be that of double bass fiddle by Serge Koussevitzky, eminent director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For this event, on October 23, the artist will be assisted by Henri Casadesus, viol d'amour player.

DETROIT, MICH.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD

SEP 2 [illegible]

190

Roth Quartet Heard as Music Festival Ends

Budapest Group Scores at Last of Mrs. Frederick Coolidge Chamber Music Concerts

Mozart Is Featured

Gordon Players Also on Final Program at Pittsfield, Mass.

By Francis D. Perkins

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Sept. 21.—Mrs. Frederick Sprague Coolidge's tenth anniversary chamber music festival of South Mountain closed here to-day with two concerts featured by the first American performances of three compositions and the American debut of a notable chamber music ensemble, the Roth quartet of Budapest.

This group, composed of Feri Roth and Jeno Antal, violins; Ferenc Molnar, viola, and Albert Van Dorn, 'cello, played the morning program, which offered two of the day's novelties, Frank Bridge's third quartet and a quintet by the Czech composer, Bohuslav Martinu, preceded by Mozart's G major quartet, K 387.

Performance Impressive

The appearance of the Roth quartet resulted from a hearing of the group by Mrs. Coolidge last summer in Paris. Its performance to-day provided a strong testimonial for her selective ability. The Hungarian quartet is a young organization, but in the matter of unity and balance of performance, blending of tone, the effect conveyed by the players of a single, thoroughly fused artistic entity, the group made an unusual impression.

The quartet deserves particular praise for its memorable playing of Mozart, perfectly proportioned with delicate variety of color and remarkable finish of detail. The group's tone possesses smoothness and polish; it is not primarily big tone, but is full in quality and sufficient in volume. The modern works showed that Mr. Roth and his colleagues are at home not only in Mozart. Mr. Bridge's quartet in three movements is about half an hour long. It has not designated key and is in a distinctly latter-day vein. At a first hearing it is not readily self-revealing; while certain prominent phrases are discernible, the English composer's plan and the sequence of his musical thought eluded us. There seemed relatively little variety of color, considerable soberness of mood and certain engaging passages, such as a slow interlude near the end. It might well prove more rewarding on a second hearing.

Czech Musical Atmosphere

The quintet of Martinu, whose "The Tumult" was played here last season by the Boston Symphony, is in a lighter vein, graceful and pleasing. While the harmonies are modern, the tuneful themes and their development are conservative. There is considerable liveliness, with a hint or two of Czech musical atmosphere and a closing fugue. Egon Kornstein played the second viola part. The Roth quartet was enthusiastically welcomed by an audience which stood for the final applause. A breaking cello string provided a slight mishap, but the players were not disturbed by this incident.

Arnold Schoenberg's third quartet, dedicated, like the other new works on the day's program, to Mrs. Coolidge, was the afternoon novelty. It is a tonal, of course, its harmonics sound harsh and there is little variety of color. But it proved easier to follow than we had expected. While revolutionary in relation to familiar ideas of harmony and construction, it suggested fidelity to a formula of Schoenberg's own, and attempting to follow and characterize the formula was interesting.

Short principal themes, constantly repeated with relatively little change or development, were one feature of the composition. Another feature was the unemotionality which marks not only this quartet among recent works, but in certain chromatic passages in the middle movements Schoenberg admitted a certain hint of post romanticism.

Garden Quartet Scores

While the quartet provided interest as an intellectual exercise, it may be doubted if it is likely ever to be loved, unless present musical tastes become substantially changed. In to-day's audience, which possessed an unusually high aggregate amount of musical knowledge and culture, Schoenbergites appeared to be considerably in the minority.

The Gordon string quartet, which had appeared in the opening festival program Wednesday night, accomplished its difficult task laudably. Hugo Kortschak conducted the chamber orchestra of Boston, composed of Boston Symphony men, in the first and last numbers of the afternoon, the minuet from Schubert's Fifth Symphony in B flat and Respighi's "Trittico Botticelliano" dedicated to Mrs. Coolidge and commissioned by her for a Library of Congress festival.

At the end Mr. Kortschak led the orchestra in a fanfare for Mrs. Coolidge and thus closed a very successful festival.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 23 1928

"Casals of the Double Bass" Will Lead Simfonietta Here

The story of how Fabian Sevitzky, nephew of the Boston Symphony's distinguished conductor, Sergei Koussevitzky, "fell in love with the big fiddle" and became known as the "Casals of the Double Bass," is a triumph of artistic determination and perseverance, and moreover has had its present reward in his conductorship of the remarkable musical organization known as the Philadelphia Chamber String Simfonietta, or more familiarly as just "the Simfonietta," which will have its Washington premiere in the Cooperative Artist Concert Course.

Born in Tver, Russia, he commenced his musical career at the age of 8, and at 12 years determined to enter the conservatory at Petrograd, by winning a scholarship there. Not an easy matter, since no scholarships were available in either piano or violin, the two instruments on which his talent was obvious. Indeed there was but one vacancy—for a double bass player, and at once he set out to play the huge instrument. When a few months later he duly presented himself at the auditions, the youngest of entrants, he was so small that he had to stand on a stool to play. Nevertheless, he won the Cui scholarship and was admitted to the conservatory and on his graduation he received the gold medal, being, incidentally, the only person who ever did win it there for work on the double bass.

In March, 1923, he came to this country and obtained a position in the Philadelphia Orchestra, and between seasons he bridged the gap by going down to Mexico on a concert tour—as player of the big fiddle. He made such a remarkable success in Mexico City that he was hailed all over the country as the "Casals of the Double Bass" and his reputation was made. But he soon found that here in America there is no audience for the double bass as a concert instrument, so he at once began his greater work, the realization of his greatest dream, that had haunted him since boyhood days. Chamber music glorified—to catch the fancy of the great music-loving public by tripling the quintet, by doubling the quartet—and so the Simfonietta was born and its success is musical history. It will be heard here next Winter at Washington Auditorium.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN
SEP 23 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO GIVE CONCERTS HERE

Usual Series Will Begin on November 23—Serge Koussevitzky to Conduct

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its usual series of five concerts at the Academy of Music this season, beginning Friday evening, Nov. 23. Mr. Koussevitzky sailed from Europe Sept. 19 and will assemble the orchestra for its first rehearsals the last of the month. Since the early 80's the Boston Symphony has stood for the utmost in symphonic performance. The best musicians Europe and America could provide were rigorously trained by a succession of conductors into an ensemble which has sent the name and fame of this orchestra out over the world.

In Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony found an inexorable drillmaster and a persuasive artist combined. His magnetic presence and extraordinary imaginative sweep have inspired this illustrious organization to new heights of eloquence and beauty that has electrified the symphony public with the spectacle of a new achievement in symphonic performance.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
SEP 24 1928

Symphony Orchestra To Give Concert Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, which has been selected as the third and middle attraction in the series of five artists' concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, will give two concerts in Washington and two in Baltimore this season under Mrs. Wilson-Greene's management. It is possible that the orchestra may in the future pay an annual visit to Richmond, as it does in the other two cities where the same impresario operates. Representations for the course are being made now at Walter D. Moses & Co., where great care is given mail and telephone orders.

AKRON, OHIO
TIMES

New Music Hall To Open In Cleveland

South Wing of Public Has Seating Capacity of 3000

Cleveland will open its newest music hall, the new south wing of the gigantic Public Auditorium, this fall with the Boston Symphony orchestra as the first of the series of recitals and concerts in the new "Cleveland Concert Course" with Grace Denton as the producer.

The hall seats 3000 and is the result of some dissatisfaction at the huge auditorium that serves well for opera but that is far too large for a recital or ordinary concert artist. Something of the same thing may yet come to Akron, if the proposed hall is built as a part of the University of Akron group in J. Ed. Good Park.

The concert course in Cleveland represents a mixture that has become increasingly popular and the prices are as attractive. In addition to the Koussevitsky-conducted Boston orchestra will be Roland Hayes, Maria Jeritza, Jascha Heifitz and Paul Whiteman and his concert orchestra with George Gershwin as soloist. The opening is set for October 31 and then one concert a month will follow.

The move of many of Cleveland's veteran organizations from the older Masonic Hall to the new Music Hall of Public Auditorium is rather significant.

First will be the Singers Club, which for more than 35 years has been singing for the fun of it and which numbers in its chorus of 125 some of the leading business and professional men of the city. It is representative, in this day when music finds more sponsors than actual participants among the social set, of the old time musical organization. Every year for this third of a century they have given three concerts—this year their Wednesday evening concerts will be in the new hall with Giovanni Martinelli, John Charles Thomas and Elsa Alsen as soloists. Each year they sing to capacity houses and yet, so high priced as their soloists and so elaborate the parties that follow each concert, they must meet a deficit.

All the college shows will also be in the new hall, which should be of interest to the Akron alumni of Princeton, Yale and Harvard, who help make up the full houses that greet Triangle, Dramat and Hasty Pudding productions in Cleveland.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 23

Music Notes

Outlook for Providence's Music Season at Present Vague.—Music Teachers and Pupils Begin Activities.—Worcester Festival Programs.

Music teachers and their pupils are gathering momentum for the new season. The latch is off the metronome, and pianos, fiddles and voices go in for limbering up exercises. The pipes are calling the music club clans.

What is otherwise in store for Providence concertgoers is only vague foreseen at present. A large group of musically interested people was formed last year for the purpose of bringing artists here, but no definite plans are as yet announced. Smaller groups, such as that which offered a series of programs at the Women's College last season, will function again. The Boston Symphony is to be one, at least, of Providence's major attractions.

No one appears to take the place of the late Albert Steinert, whose series of concerts formed the backbone of the musical season for many years. And even if one did there would be physical reasons to hamper any efforts along that line. Providence still is without an available auditorium large enough to make possible concerts by the more expensive artists. There is a delay in completing the Masonic auditorium which at one time was thought would be ready for the Boston Symphony this year. The larger theatres, where Sunday concerts were once held are filled with movies. Only by special arrangement is the Albee Theatre open to the Boston Symphony on Tuesday nights. The Symphony, by the way, starts its season on Oct. 4 in Boston.

The more active concertgoer will doubtless make pilgrimages to Boston where the Sunday afternoons at Symphony Hall are due to begin Oct. 14 with Kreisler, followed by Farrar and with Galli Curci, Hayes, Heifetz, Rachmaninoff, Homer, Hofmann, McCormack, Schipa, Werrenrath and Casals listed. Mr. Koussevitzky and his double bass are scheduled for a recital on the evening of Oct. 15.

Remindful of what Providence used to have is the series in Hartford provided by Robert Kellogg, an impresario there for six years. His opener will be a concert by Mme. Homer and her daughters, Louise Homer Stires and Catherine Homer, on Oct. 28. After them will come five concerts by Tita Schipa and Alberto Salvi, Galli Curci, Rachmaninoff, Ponselle, Albert Spalding and John Charles Thomas.

NEW YORK TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY RETURNS.

Will Begin Fifth Season With the Boston Symphony on Oct. 5.

Serge Koussevitzky returned yesterday morning on the Ile de France to begin his fifth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will lead the first concert of the year in Symphony Hall on Oct. 5. He brought manuscripts of several new compositions which he expects to introduce to American audiences during the coming season.

In addition to his duties as orchestra conductor in several cities of the East and Middle West, Mr. Koussevitzky will once more appear as a recitalist on the double bass in Boston on Oct. 15 and in Carnegie Hall on Oct. 23. He left yesterday afternoon for a short stay in Philadelphia before beginning rehearsals in Boston.

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY

HER OCT 13
By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Stravinsky, "Apollon Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"), a ballet (first time in Boston); Kodaly, suite from his comic opera, "Hary Janos" (first time in Boston); Schumann, Symphony, B flat, No. 1.

The disappointment of those who seeing the name of Stravinsky went prepared to sulk, pout, rage and find fault with Mr. Koussevitzky for daring to conduct another piece by this son of Belial, flushed with insolence and vodka, this Antichrist in contemporaneous musical life, must have been keen. For in this ballet there was no orgy of dissonances, no thunderous crashes, no drums beaten as if by madmen. There was simple music, often tuneful, often beautiful; when there were commonplace passages they were not disturbing to Stravinsky's admirers; and these commonplaces reassured and pleased the reactionaries who are suspicious of anything they think is mildly or audaciously original. The prevailing spirit of this ballet is of the 18th century.

"Apollo," scored for strings only, was first heard at the indefatigable Mrs. Coolidge's chamber musical festival in the music room of the Library of Congress in Washington, D. C., on April 27, 1928. Mr. Bolm then mimed Apollo. At the later performances in Paris and London Serge Lifar of the Ballet Russe was the god.

Here is the rare instance of ballet music that does not suffer by being transferred to the concert platform. There is hardly any story for the theatre stage; the action is negligible. It would seem as if Stravinsky, now tired of his futile attempt to write in the manner of Bach when that composer was dull and merely a weaver of insignificant patterns, and in the manner of Handel's oratorios—there has been only one Handel—the superb—forgot his piano concerto and his "Oedipus Rex" and bethought him of Lulli and Rameau. Thus he has joined the band of modern Frenchmen who praise these composers of the 18th century and would submit to their influence. Did not Debussy at a performance of a ballet suite from Rameau's "La Guirlande" performed in Paris 25 years ago, stand up and shout: "Hurrah for Rameau! Away with Gluck!" For in Rameau's music Debussy found the pure French musical tradition, tenderly and delicately charming, "without the affectation of German depth, without the italicization with blows of the fist, without long-winded explanations which seem to say: 'You are a parcel of idiots, who understand nothing unless one forces you in advance to accept 'bladders for lanterns.'"

No wonder that the audience yesterday enjoyed Stravinsky's dance tunes which might have served the old leaders of the ballets in the Parisian opera house moving vivaciously or with solemn poses as goddesses or nymphs.

No wonder that the applause was so general, so hearty, so long continued that Mr. Koussevitzky was recalled after the excellent performance; that the players shared in the tribute.

The suite drawn from Kodaly's comic opera, which was produced at Budapest in 1926, is another matter; more dependent, no doubt, on the action, with the effect increased by the scenery, costumes and the dramatic dialogue or soliloquy. This Hary Janos, a boastful peasant, having returned to his village, tells, as an old man of the wonders he has seen, the deeds that he has done. He overthrew in battle Napoleon at Milan—Napoleon trembled and wept as soon as he caught sight of Hary; and Hary rescued Marie Louise and took her to her imperial father in Vienna—hence the boisterous march in the nature of a Hungarian Rhapsody that ends the suite.

The burlesque battle scene is amusing, but how much more entertaining it would be in the opera house! The prodigious orchestral sneeze with which the prelude opens is also amusing, a clever instrumental trick, but what would a hearer make of it, were he not told that in Hungary when any one perpetuates a whopper, an accidental sneeze from man of woman in the company is an assurance of the narrator's truthfulness however incredible the tale may seem. There is beautiful music in the section entitled "Song," where Hary and his sweetheart long to see again their fatherland. Here, as elsewhere in the suite, Kodaly uses Hungarian melody. This suite, as we have said, is entertaining, the work of an accomplished musician, who, while understanding and able to write in the ultra-modern idiom, is not afraid of melody even when it is frankly national or has undergone sophistication. Although Kodaly is known as an enthusiastic lover and collector of folk songs, his hobby has not made him a parochial composer. He is not forced for inspiration to sit in a village belfry.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a brilliant and eloquent reading of Schumann's symphony; so eloquent that one forgot for the time being the oft repeated slurs on Schumann's orchestration and the oft heard remark that he wrote as if for a piano and then awkwardly handed the music to the orchestra. All in all a delightful concert.

It will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Haydn's Symphony in G major called "The Surprise"; Rubin Goldmark's "Negro Rhapsody" and Cesar Franck's Symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The third concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony G major, "The Surprise." Rubin Goldmark, A Negro Rhapsody (first time in Boston). Cesar Franck, Symphony, D minor.

Mr. Koussevitzky is so fortunate in his interpretation of Haydn's music; so intelligently appreciative; so content to let the music speak for itself in its 18th century way; so regardful of the composer's clarity of expression, the finish of his workmanship and his friendly, homelike spirit, one wishes that more symphonies of Haydn, and less familiar ones than those played from time to time, were heard under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. There are conductors who say to themselves: "I suppose I must play one or two of Haydn's symphonies this season to satisfy the old fogies." And so they select from the few they know and conduct them in a perfunctory way, apologizing, as it were, to the young and voluble amateurs in the audience who think that there was no music before Debussy; that even his music is now "old hat," too obvious and melodic. This symphony as it was conducted and performed yesterday is fresher, more spontaneous, more charming music than many works of the last decade, which, when they were performed here were hailed as "original," "remarkable," even "epoch-making," and now are in the capacious dust-bin of Time.

Mr. Goldmark's Rhapsody, composed in 1921-22, was performed for the first time by the Philharmonic Society of New York in January, 1923. It has been heard in other cities of this country and was recently played in London. The name of Carl Goldmark's nephew was not unknown to our symphony audiences. His overture to "Hiawatha" has been performed twice at the concerts of this orchestra; his tone-poem "Samson" has also been played here. For the thematic material of his "Negro Rhapsody" the composer naturally took what are known as "Spirituals," with the exception of a Tennessee river tune. The themes are inherently interesting; they should lend themselves easily to emotional or rhythmically brilliant treatment.

Mr. Goldmark has composed the Rhapsody in what might be called the post-war orthodox manner. Perhaps it was the only way to treat these themes. He knew that the melodies themselves, the stirring rhythms, at times after the fashion of a negro "break-down," with thunderous climaxes, would excite immediate applause. He is an excellent musician, well grounded in the grammar and rhetoric of his profession. He brought out the effects he wished to make. His labor was rewarded yesterday by enthusiastic applause. He was twice obliged to acknowledge the tribute. He acknowledged it modestly, rising from his seat on the floor; not making a frantic rush with flying coat tails to the platform.

As the "Pelleastres" for a time did Debussy harm; so the "Franckists" injured the reputation of Cesar Franck. They insisted on his aloofness from earthly strife, joy, sorrow, passion. They proclaimed him a mystic, dwelling in the seventh heaven and hearing, if not the celestial choir, at least the music of the spheres. His compositions were of plenary inspiration: not a note could be added; not a note could be taken away.

A reaction was inevitable. Younger composers, escaping his influence, were tired of his alleged perfection. Older composers, envious no doubt of his fame, were wearied by the recital of his private and musical virtues. Was he overestimated soon after his death? For some years it has been the fashion to underestimate him; to speak of "the false mysticism of the old Belgian angel." Too frequent repetitions of his music, even of that masterpiece the violin sonata and of his symphony were not of benefit to him. (It was as with Tchaikovsky and his "Pathetic" symphony.)

Today it is only just to recognize Franck's eminence among composers. To say that his symphony is flawless is not so easy. We believe that in the first movement the return of the sombre introduction, even with a changed tonality, before the full exposition, development and continuance of the main body of the movement, was a mistake. It might reasonably be said that there is in this movement over-elaboration, a surplusage of detail, unnecessary repetitions of thematic fragments given in turn to various instruments or choirs of instruments, a favorite device of Tchaikovsky's. There might something be said with regard to diffuseness in the other movements.

The performance was dramatic. Even a spiritually endowed organist may be pardoned for being dramatic in his music. Too much has been said about Franck's piety and humility. There should be no quarrel with Mr. Koussevitzky about his fiery reading of the work; but, surely, the finale does not admit of the rapid pace at which he, as other conductors in the past, took the movement. The music demands breadth and continuous, stately sonority. Here is not a quick allegro, even though there are two beats in the measure. The rapid playing makes the finale feverish; and gives a certain triviality, even flippancy to passages that should be dignified and imposing.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Prokofieff, "Classical" Symphony. Debussy, prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun." Michal Kondraczki, Partita. Brahms, Symphony in D major, No. 2.

"NEGRO RHAPSODY" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rubin Goldmark Hears His Work Performed

Koussevitzky Conducts Brilliant Performances of Two Symphonies

Rubin Goldmark, the well-known composer and teacher long resident in New York, heard at yesterday's Symphony concert an eloquent performance of his "A Negro Rhapsody." At the end he rose in his place near the front of the floor and bowed repeated acknowledgments of the very hearty applause. Mr Koussevitzky had put two symphonies on the program, Haydn's "Surprise" and Cesar Franck's. He gave remarkably brilliant interpretations of both of these familiar classics. If applause is a test yesterday's concert pleased the subscribers far more than either of the earlier ones of the new season.

Goldmark, a nephew of the composer of the "Sakuntala Overture" and numerous other long popular works, was educated in Vienna and New York. A man in his 50s, he is naturally conservative rather than futuristic in his work. "A Negro Rhapsody," written in 1919-22, is based on seven themes, either taken over bodily from Negro tunes, or in the same general style. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen," "O Peter Go Ring dem Bells," "Oh Religion is a Fortune," "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child," "Oh When I come to ...," and an unfamiliar tune collected years ago in Tennessee, provide the principal melodic ideas. The counter themes are of the composer's own invention.

Sonorous Climaxes

Mr Goldmark has treated these now universally popular tunes skillfully, building up enormous climaxes by piling together phrases from several different ones. He has scored his music for orchestra with a rather self conscious ingenuity.

The audience was delighted with the piece even before it discovered the presence of the composer. Such potpouris as this do not of course claim to have profound originality or great imaginative depths. But it is perhaps better to write unpretentious music that succeeds in pleasing an audience than to strive unsuccessfully to produce a masterpiece.

Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a thoroughly enjoyable and remarkably fine performance of Haydn's "Surprise Symphony." The only attempt at innovation in the conductor's interpretation was the unusually slow pace at which the minuet, marked "Allegro molte" was played. This movement has usually been taken very rapidly by other conductors. It gains notably by Mr Koussevitzky's reading.

One wonders just what "allegro molte" meant in the 18th Century. Dr Muck used to take the first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony, also marked "allegro molte," more slowly than anyone else plays it. In this case also as with yesterday's Haydn minuet, the slow pace plainly suits the music better than the rapid one.

Haydn has not lost his hold on audiences, as yesterday's applause showed. One may smile at this apparent naivete, and find his "surprise" no longer startling, but the flow of amiable, high spirited melody, the occasional hints at solemnity, the imaginative vitality of the music is unquestionable.

Franck's Symphony

Franck's Symphony Mr Koussevitzky rightly regards as a romantic and energetic piece, with no mysticism or "otherworldliness" about it. Play it as though it were Liszt, as he does, and it gains by what some will call lack of reverence. Passages of this music are strident, boisterous, almost vulgar. Even the slow movement has much more in common with Berliez than with Palestrina. Its real distinction is an originality of style that verges on mannerism, witness the incessant modulations, the curiously characteristic rhythms.

After all, the outstanding French composers since 1830 have been the original men like Berliez, Franck, Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, Honegger, not the correct and clever people like Saint-Saens, nor the sentimentalists like Gounod and Massenet. One can think of more examples of originality of style among French 19th century writers than among Germans.

There is much more obvious connection between the music of Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Brahms than between that of the Frenchmen named above.

Next week's program is to include Prokefieff's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a Partita by an unknown Polish composer, Kendraczki, and Brahms' D major Symphony.—P. R.

SYMPHONY EASY UPON LISTENER

Goldmark's "Rhapsody" Wins Rounds of Applause

Post OCT. 20.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As though in anticipation of the none too stimulating weather conditions, Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared for the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme by no means taxing to the listener.

For beginning and end came two familiar and well-liked symphonies—Haydn's "Surprise" and that of Cesar Franck, while the remaining and novel piece was the readily assimilated "Negro Rhapsody" of Rubin Goldmark.

APPLAUD THE RHAPSODY

Composed between 1919 and 1922, Mr. Goldmark's Rhapsody has already found favor in other cities, and yesterday's audience plainly rejoiced in it. From his seat near the stage the composer, who had come over from New York for the occasion, bowed in acknowledgement of the long-continued applause, nor did the audience rest content till the members of the orchestra had likewise arisen.

That Mr. Goldmark's music should win such immediate response is easily understandable. Going for his thematic material to seven Negro melodies, six of them Spirituals, Mr. Goldmark has used this expressive material with musicianly resource and frequent effectiveness. But on the whole this admirably made piece seems oversuave, sophisticated and polite. One misses the primitive, the ecstatic note. And the orchestral dress, although sumptuous and sonorous, does not always escape the reproach of undue thickness.

The Symphony of Haydn, beloved of Mr. Koussevitzky, was played delightfully. How fresh this music sounds after close on a century and a half. Fresher, it is temptation to write, than that of Franck, which yesterday companioned it.

With Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of this latter work it is still possible here and there to disagree, albeit his version of the music has become somewhat modified, more tempered and restrained, since first it was disclosed to us in Boston. In it the essential Franck is often to be found, his native eloquence heightened and intensified. But in the background there still lurks, and from it now and then emerges, an alien figure, a sort of Belgian Tchaikovsky reveling in frenetic outbursts and sentimental rallentandos. By the audience, consistently enthusiastic throughout the concert, this vivid, gorgeously colored reading of the symphony was rapturously received, and once again the conductor answered his listeners' insistent plaudits by summoning the musicians to their feet.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 6 -

KOUSSEVITZKY OPENS SEASON IN BOSTON

Famous Symphony Conductor Returns From Europe.

Serge Koussevitzky arrived in New York Tuesday from Europe full of plan for a Boston Symphony season of especial interest and musical importance. The Russian conductor opened his fifth season at the head of the famous orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston. He told questioning reporters of some significant new scores which he brought in his trunk from Europe and which are to have their first performances in the course of the season. These include new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinue (the Czecho-Slovakian) and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities. Especial concerts in observance of the Schubert centennial are also announced.

During the summer, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, at which he introduced no less than thirteen works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussevitzky also listened to much music and conferred with composers. Before returning to America, he had several weeks of well-earned recreation, which he spent mountain climbing with the composer, Prokofieff, in the French Alps.

Koussevitzky, whose extraordinary mastery of the double-bass brought him great fame before his days of conducting, will give his first New York recital upon this unusual instrument this month, October 23. On landing in New York, he devoted several days to making phonograph records of his double-bass solos.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 5 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 48th concert season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor, directed this performance, thereby opening his fifth season with the Boston organization.

Koussevitzky and his orchestra will open the symphony series in Columbus with a concert in Memorial Hall November 1, under the auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The club is presenting its fifth annual series.

In preparation for the opening of what the club considers the most pretentious and highly artistic group of concerts ever sponsored during its history, members of the Symphony Club will hold a meeting Monday at 2:30 p. m., at the home of Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia-av.

Rev. Dr. McIlyar Hamilton Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will address the member on the merits of symphony music and the benefits derived from it in Columbus.

Other concerts on the series are by the Cincinnati Symphony, Memorial Hall, Dec. 3. Fritz Reiner, who has not been seen in action in Columbus for several seasons, is to conduct. A matinee concert for children is also scheduled for the Concinnati on the afternoon of the same day. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff will handle the baton. His work in Memorial Hall last season was greatly appreciated by a packed house.

On Feb. 4 the Cleveland orchestra will make its fifth annual appearance in Columbus and again under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff. Helen Pugh Alcorn, Columbus pianist, who has distinguished herself as soloist with several great American orchestras in recent years, will appear with the Cleveland orchestra.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 5 -

News Notes

Serge Koussevitzky, the composer, will be heard when the Boston Symphony conductor gives his recital for the double bass. Several of his own compositions will be included, one of major importance, a concerto in three movements and some smaller pieces in a miscellaneous group.

Henri Casadesus, who is coming to this country to participate in this concert and also in the Boston recital, is scheduled to arrive on the steamer Rochambeau, due Monday.

* * *

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

OCT 7 -

Boston Orchestra Here November 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Boston last Friday night and Saturday afternoon, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Pittsburgh is to be one of the first cities visited by the Boston Symphony this season, opening the orchestral season here Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3, at Syria Mosque. Pittsburgh is to have three visits by the New York Philharmonic, with their leaders, Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini. The Chicago Orchestra also is included for one evening concert, under Frederic Stock. Others to return are the Cleveland Orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE

Chronicle
OCT 7 1926

Cleveland Listed

In its Middle Western tour this winter the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will also ...

PORTLAND, ME.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

OCT 7 -

Mr. Serge Koussevitsky, the leader of the Symphony Orchestra, was among the well known passengers arriving on the Ile de France, which docked in New York the middle of the week from Havre.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE DOUBLE BASS RECITAL

An event of unusual interest in New York will be the recital for double bass fiddle by Serge Koussevitsky, which will take place in Carnegie hall on Tuesday evening, October 23. Before gaining fame as a conductor, Mr. Koussevitsky, achieved a brilliant reputation throughout Europe as a master performer on this rarely heard instrument. Boston and New York are the only cities in which he will perform this season. For these concerts he will have the assistance of M. Henri Casadesus, master viol d'amour player, who is making a special trip from Boston to participate in these concerts. The Society of Ancient Instruments, founded in 1901 in Paris, by M. Henri Casadesus, will return in January next. This unique organization came to America last April at the invitation of Mrs. E. S. Coolidge. They will make several private and public appearances in New York and travel as far west as Chicago.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 7 -

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when they come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, evening, October 30.

Always a sparkling and vivid programmaker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old. He is to give in Boston this winter the premiere performances of new symphonies by Prokofieff, with whom, by the way, he spent his holidays climbing in the French Alps; also of Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premiere will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the last of his abilities.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his double-bass recitals with a New York concert, on October 23.

The other six concerts in this series in Elmwood Music Hall will include the Philharmonic Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when they come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, evening, October 30.

Always a sparkling and vivid programmaker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old. He is to give in Boston this winter the premiere performances of new symphonies by Prokofieff, with whom, by the way, he spent his holidays climbing in the French Alps; also of Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premiere will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the last of his abilities.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his double-bass recitals with a New York concert, on October 23.

The other six concerts in this series in Elmwood Music Hall will include the Philharmonic Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

OCT 7 -

Serge Koussevitzky Returns from Europe

Serge Koussevitzky has arrived from Europe, full of plans for a Boston Symphony season of especial interest and musical importance. The Russian conductor opened his fifth season at the head of the famous orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday, Oct. 5.

He told questioning reporters of some new scores which he brought in his trunk from Europe and which are to have their first performance in the course of the season. These include new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinu (the Czechoslovakian) and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions.

The opening program of the Boston Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday, comprised Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, and "Eroica" Symphony, Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Hindemith's Concerto, Opus 38.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch
OCT 7

STAGE and STUDIO

THE Boston Symphony orchestra launched into its forty-eighth season, Friday evening, in Symphony hall at Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated European and American conductor, at the same time began his fifth year as the mentor of the famous band of musicians.

At press time for this page, comments by eastern cities on this concert, which is considered in Boston as the greatest musical event of the season, had not yet reached Columbus.

What the sages have to say, however, is of vital interest in central Ohio, because Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra will open the symphony season in Columbus at Memorial hall on Nov. 1.

ARRIVES FROM PARIS.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Paris only ten days ago and in the interim he put his orchestra through a strenuous pace of rehearsals preparatory to the first concert. Recenty he completed his "Concerts Koussevitzky," a series which he has sponsored annually for the past decade in Paris.

The famous conductor is expected to bring some new music in the symphonic category before the public this season. Upon his return from abroad Koussevitzky had in his trunks scores of new symphonies by Prokofieff; Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Freedrick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities.

In the meanwhile the Symphony club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is preparing for a concerted drive, beginning Tuesday, to sell out Memorial hall for all four concerts in the series.

DRIVE STARTS MONDAY.

Monday, at 2:30, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, will preside at a meeting of members of all divisions of the organization, at which plans for the drive will be discussed.

The box office for the sale of seats will open at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday, Oct. 22. In the meanwhile season reservations can be made with Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, executive secretary of the club.

OTHER CONCERTS.

Second on the series is a children's matinee performance and an evening concert by the Cincinnati symphony, Dec. 3. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff will direct the afternoon appearance, while Fritz Reiner will conduct in the evening.

On Feb. 4 Columbus will hear a return engagement of Nikolai Sokoloff and his Cleveland orchestra. Featuring this concert will be the solo work of Helen Pugh Alcorn, one of Columbus' piano celebrities, who has played with several of America's best orchestras.

Closing the series are a children's matinee and evening concert by the Detroit orchestra under the direction of Victor Kolar, on March 4. Elsa Alsen, prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Co., is to be soloist.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation when they come to Elmwood Music hall on Tuesday evening, October 30th.

Always a sparkling and vivid programme maker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his famous double-bass recitals with a New York concert on October 23d. The other six concerts in this notable symphony series in Elmwood Music hall will include the Philharmonic-Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15th.

Tuesday, December 4th, introduces Victor Kolar to an evening audience as conductor of an entire program. Mr. Kolar, who is Mr. Gabrilowitsch's ass... will conduct 60 per ... symphony con...

"NEGRO RHAPSODY" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Rubin Goldmark Hears His Work Performed

Koussevitzky Conducts Brilliant Performances of Two Symphonies

Rubin Goldmark, the well-known composer and teacher long resident in New York, heard at yesterday's Symphony concert an eloquent performance of his "A Negro Rhapsody." At the end he rose in his place near the front of the floor and bowed repeated acknowledgments of the very hearty applause. Mr Koussevitzky had put two symphonies on the program, Haydn's "Surprise" and Cesar Franck's. He gave remarkably brilliant interpretations of both of these familiar classics. If applause is a test yesterday's concert pleased the subscribers far more than either of the earlier ones of the new season.

Goldmark, a nephew of the composer of the "Sakuntala Overture" and numerous other long popular works, was educated in Vienna and New York. A man in his 50s, he is naturally conservative rather than futuristic in his work. "A Negro Rhapsody," written in 1919-22, is based on seven themes, either taken over bodily from Negro tunes, or in the same general style. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen," "O Peter Go Ring dem Bells," "Oh Religion is a Fortune," "Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child," "Oh When I come to ...," and an unfamiliar tune collected years ago in Tennessee, provide the principal melodic ideas. The counter themes are of the composer's own invention.

Sonorous Climaxes

Mr Goldmark has treated these now universally popular tunes skillfully, building up enormous climaxes by piling together phrases from several different ones. He has scored his music for orchestra with a rather self conscious ingenuity.

The audience was delighted with the piece even before it discovered the presence of the composer. Such potpouris as this do not of course claim to have profound originality or great imaginative depths. But it is perhaps better to write unpretentious music that succeeds in pleasing an audience than to strive unsuccessfully to produce a masterpiece.

Mr Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave a thoroughly enjoyable and remarkably fine performance of Haydn's "Surprise Symphony." The only attempt at innovation in the conductor's interpretation was the unusually slow pace at which the minuet, marked "Allegro molte" was played. This movement has usually been taken very rapidly by other conductors. It gains notably by Mr Koussevitzky's reading.

One wonders just what "allegro molte" meant in the 18th Century. Dr Muck used to take the first movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony, also marked "allegro molte," more slowly than anyone else plays it. In this case also as with yesterday's Haydn minuet, the slow pace plainly suits the music better than the rapid one.

Haydn has not lost his hold on audiences, as yesterday's applause showed. One may smile at this apparent naivete, and find his "surprise" no longer startling, but the flow of amiable, high spirited melody, the occasional hints at solemnity, the imaginative vitality of the music is unquestionable.

Franck's Symphony

Franck's Symphony Mr Koussevitzky rightly regards as a romantic and energetic piece, with no mysticism or "otherworldliness" about it. Play it as though it were Liszt, as he does, and it gains by what some will call lack of reverence. Passages of his music are strident, boisterous, almost vulgar. Even the slow movement has much more in common with Berliez than with Palestrina. Its real distinction is an originality of style that verges on mannerism, witness the incessant modulations, the curiously characteristic rhythms.

After all, the outstanding French composers since 1830 have been the original men like Berliez, Franck, Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, Honegger, not the correct and clever people like Saint-Saens, nor the sentimentalists like Gounod and Massenet. One can think of more examples of originality of style among French 19th century writers than among Germans.

There is much more obvious connection between the music of Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann and Brahms than between that of the Frenchmen named above.

Next week's program is to include Prokefieff's "Classical Symphony," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," a Partita by an unknown Polish composer, Kendraczki, and Brahms' D major Symphony.—P. R.

SYMPHONY EASY UPON LISTENER

Goldmark's "Rhapsody" Wins Rounds of Applause

Post Oct. 20.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As though in anticipation of the none too stimulating weather conditions, Mr. Koussevitzky had prepared for the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon a programme by no means taxing to the listener.

For beginning and end came two familiar and well-liked symphonies—Haydn's "Surprise" and that of Cesar Franck, while the remaining and novel piece was the readily assimilated "Negro Rhapsody" of Rubin Goldmark.

APPLAUD THE RHAPSODY

Composed between 1919 and 1922, Mr. Goldmark's Rhapsody has already found favor in other cities, and yesterday's audience plainly rejoiced in it. From his seat near the stage the composer, who had come over from New York for the occasion, bowed in acknowledgement of the long-continued applause, nor did the audience rest content till the members of the orchestra had likewise arisen.

That Mr. Goldmark's music should win such immediate response is easily understandable. Going for his thematic material to seven Negro melodies, six of them Spirituals, Mr. Goldmark has used this expressive material with musicianly resource and frequent effectiveness. But on the whole this admirably made piece seems oversuave, sophisticated and polite. One misses the primitive, the ecstatic note. And the orchestral dress, although sumptuous and sonorous, does not always escape the reproach of undue thickness.

The Symphony of Haydn, beloved of Mr. Koussevitzky, was played delightfully. How fresh this music sounds after close on a century and a half. Fresher, it is temptation to write, than that of Franck, which yesterday companioned it.

With Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of this latter work it is still possible here and there to disagree, albeit his version of the music has become somewhat modified, more tempered and restrained, since first it was disclosed to us in Boston. In it the essential Franck is often to be found, his native eloquence heightened and intensified. But in the background there still lurks, and from it now and then emerges, an alien figure, a sort of Belgian Tchaikovsky reveling in frenetic outbursts and sentimental rallentandos. By the audience, consistently enthusiastic throughout the concert, this vivid, gorgeously colored reading of the symphony was rapturously received, and once again the conductor answered his listeners' insistent plaudits by summoning the musicians to their feet.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

KOUSSEVITZKY OPENS SEASON IN BOSTON

Famous Symphony Conductor Returns From Europe.

Serge Koussevitzky arrived in New York Tuesday from Europe full of plans for a Boston Symphony season of especial interest and musical importance. The Russian conductor opened his fifth season at the head of the famous orchestra in Symphony hall, Boston. He told questioning reporters of some significant new scores which he brought in his trunk from Europe and which are to have their first performances in the course of the season. These include new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinue (the Czecho-Slovakian) and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities. Especial concerts in observance of the Schubert centennial are also announced.

During the summer, Mr. Koussevitzky conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, at which he introduced no less than thirteen works to the Parisian public, including Carpenter's "Skyscrapers." Koussevitzky also listened to much music and conferred with composers. Before returning to America, he had several weeks of well-earned recreation, which he spent mountain climbing with the composer, Prokofieff, in the French Alps.

Koussevitzky, whose extraordinary mastery of the double-bass brought him great fame before his days of conducting, will give his first New York recital upon this unusual instrument this month, October 23. On landing in New York, he devoted several days to making phonograph records of his double-bass solos.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

Oct 5 - 1926

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 48th concert season in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor, directed this performance, thereby opening his fifth season with the Boston organization.

Koussevitzky and his orchestra will open the symphony series in Columbus with a concert in Memorial Hall November 1, under the auspices of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio. The club is presenting its fifth annual series.

In preparation for the opening of what the club considers the most pretentious and highly artistic group of concerts ever sponsored during its history, members of the Symphony Club will hold a meeting Monday at 2:30 p. m., at the home of Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia-av.

Rev. Dr. McIlyar Hamilton Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will address the member on the merits of symphony music and the benefits derived from it in Columbus.

Other concerts on the series are by the Cincinnati Symphony, Memorial Hall, Dec. 3. Fritz Reiner, who has not been seen in action in Columbus for several seasons, is to conduct. A matinee concert for children is also scheduled for the Concinnati on the afternoon of the same day. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff will handle the baton. His work in Memorial Hall last season was greatly appreciated by a packed house.

On Feb. 4 the Cleveland orchestra will make its fifth annual appearance in Columbus and again under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff. Helen Pugh Alcorn, Columbus pianist, who has distinguished herself as soloist with several great American orchestras in recent years, will appear with the Cleveland orchestra.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Oct 5 - 1926

News Notes

Serge Koussevitzky, the composer, will be heard when the Boston Symphony conductor gives his recital for the double bass. Several of his own compositions will be included, one of major importance, a concerto in three movements and some smaller pieces in a miscellaneous group.

Henri Casadesus, who is coming to this country to participate in this concert and also in the Boston recital, is scheduled to arrive on the steamer Rochambeau, due Monday.

* * *

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Boston Orchestra Here November 2

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season in Boston last Friday night and Saturday afternoon, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Pittsburgh is to be one of the first cities visited by the Boston Symphony this season, opening the orchestral season here Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3, at Syria Mosque. Pittsburgh is to have three visits by the New York Philharmonic, with their leaders, Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini. The Chicago Orchestra also is included for one evening concert, under Frederic Stock. Others to return are the Cleveland Orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.

Oct 7 1926

Cleveland Listed

In its Middle Western tour this winter the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play in Cleveland.

...RAM

...erge Koussevitsky, the leader of the ...Symphony Orchestra, was among the ... well known passengers arriving on the Ile de France, which docked in New York the middle of the week from Havre.

DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

KOUSSEVITZKY TO GIVE DOUBLE BASS RECITAL

An event of unusual interest in New York will be the recital for double bass fiddle by Serge Koussevitsky, which will take place in Carnegie hall on Tuesday evening, October 23. Before gaining fame as a conductor, Mr. Koussevitsky, achieved a brilliant reputation throughout Europe as a master performer on this rarely heard instrument. Boston and New York are the only cities in which he will perform this season. For these concerts he will have the assistance of M. Henri Casadesus, master viol d'amour player, who is making a special trip from Boston to participate in these concerts. The Society of Ancient Instruments, founded in 1901 in Paris, by M. Henri Casadesus, will return in January next. This unique organization came to America last April at the invitation of Mrs. E. S. Coolidge. They will make several private and public appearances in New York and travel as far west as Chicago.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when they come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, evening, October 30.

Always a sparkling and vivid programmaker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old. He is to give in Boston this winter the premiere performances of new symphonies by Prokofieff, with whom, by the way, he spent his holidays climbing in the French Alps; also of Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premiere will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the last of his abilities.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his double-bass recitals with a New York concert, on October 23.

The other six concerts in this series in Elmwood Music Hall will include the Philharmonic Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY SERIES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when they come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday, evening, October 30.

Always a sparkling and vivid programmaker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old. He is to give in Boston this winter the premiere performances of new symphonies by Prokofieff, with whom, by the way, he spent his holidays climbing in the French Alps; also of Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premiere will be a symphony by Frederick the Great, versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the last of his abilities.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his double-bass recitals with a New York concert, on October 23.

The other six concerts in this series in Elmwood Music Hall will include the Philharmonic Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

Serge Koussevitzky Returns from Europe

Serge Koussevitzky has arrived from Europe, full of plans for a Boston Symphony season of especial interest and musical importance. The Russian conductor opened his fifth season at the head of the famous orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday, Oct. 5.

He told questioning reporters of some new scores which he brought in his trunk from Europe and which are to have their first performance in the course of the season. These include new symphonies by Prokofieff, Martinu (the Czechoslovakian) and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions.

The opening program of the Boston Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday, comprised Beethoven's Leonore Overture, No. 3, and "Eroica" Symphony, Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Hindemith's Concerto, Opus 38.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra promise to give a brilliant opening to the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation when they come to Elmwood Music hall on Tuesday evening, October 30th.

Always a sparkling and vivid programme maker, Mr. Koussevitzky has had an unusually profitable season in Europe discovering music, some of it new and some old.

Incidentally, Koussevitzky will continue his famous double-bass recitals with a New York concert on October 23d. The other six concerts in this notable symphony series in Elmwood Music hall will include the Philharmonic-Symphony, with Mengelberg, on Thursday, November 15th.

Tuesday, December 4th, introduces Victor Kolar to an evening audience as conductor of an entire program. Mr. Kolar, who is Mr. Gabrilowitsch's ass... will conduct 60 per ...ymphony mon...

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch
Oct 7 - 1926

92

STAGE and STUDIO

THE Boston Symphony orchestra launched into its forty-eighth season, Friday evening, in Symphony hall at Boston. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated European and American conductor, at the same time began his fifth year as the mentor of the famous band of musicians.

At press time for this page, comments by eastern cities on this concert, which is considered in Boston as the greatest musical event of the season, had not yet reached Columbus.

What the sages have to say, however, is of vital interest in central Ohio, because Koussevitzky and his Boston orchestra will open the symphony season in Columbus at Memorial hall on Nov. 1.

ARRIVES FROM PARIS.

Koussevitzky arrived in America from Paris only ten days ago and in the interim he put his orchestra through a strenuous pace of rehearsals preparatory to the first concert. Recenty he completed his "Concerts Koussevitzky," a series which he has sponsored annually for the past decade in Paris.

The famous conductor is expected to bring some new music in the symphonic category before the public this season. Upon his return from abroad Koussevitzky had in his trunks scores of new symphonies by Prokofieff; Martinu, the Czecho-Slovakian, and new scores by the young Americans, Copeland and Sessions. Another American premier will be a symphony by Freedrick the Great, the versatile statesman whose symphonies and skill upon the flute were not the least of his abilities.

In the meanwhile the Symphony club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is preparing for a concerted drive, beginning Tuesday, to sell out Memorial hall for all four concerts in the series.

DRIVE STARTS MONDAY.

Monday, at 2:30, Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, president of the club, will preside at a meeting of members of all divisions of the organization, at which plans for the drive will be discussed.

The box office for the sale of seats will open at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday, Oct. 22. In the meanwhile season reservations can be made with Helen Pugh Alcorn, 34 Linwood avenue, executive secretary of the club.

OTHER CONCERTS.

Second on the series is a children's matinee performance and an evening concert by the Cincinnati symphony, Dec. 3. Vladimir Bakaleinikoff will direct the afternoon appearance, while Fritz Reiner will conduct in the evening.

On Feb. 4 Columbus will hear a return engagement of Nikolai Sokoloff and his Cleveland orchestra. Featuring this concert will be the solo work of Helen Pugh Alcorn, one of Columbus' piano celebrities, who has played with several of America's best orchestras.

Closing the series are a children's matinee and evening concert by the Detroit orchestra under the direction of Victor Kolar, on March 4. Elsa Alsen, prima donna soprano of the Chicago Opera Co., is to be soloist.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 7 -

Boston Symphony Coming Here, Starts 48th Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra launched into its forty-eighth season and Serge Koussevitzky his fifth year as its conductor in their concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, Friday evening.

At the time of this writing criticisms of this concert, which is the greatest musical event of the year in Massachusetts, had not reached Columbus. These are anxiously awaited, since the Boston will open the symphony season in Columbus Nov. 1 and Koussevitzky will make his first appe[redacted]entral Ohio.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is making preparations for starting its seat sale campaign.

Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia Ave., president of the Symphony Club, has called a meeting of all divisions of the organization at her home Monday at 2:30 p. m. Rev. Mr. McIlyar Hamilton Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will address the members on the merits of symphony music and the benefits derived from it in Columbus.

According to Helen Pugh Alcorn, executive secretary of the club and in charge of the seat sale, a record in the way of attendance at symphony concerts in Columbus will be established. Mrs. Alcorn draws her conclusions from the fact that more season tickets have been sold so far this season than have been during similar periods of previous years. Mrs. Alcorn is handling season reservations at her home, 34 Linwood Ave.

Three other concerts are in the symphony series. The Cincinnati, Fritz Reiner directing, is booked for Dec. 3; the Cleveland, with Nikolai Sokoloff as conductor, Feb. 4, and the [redacted] Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Victor Kolar, is scheduled in Memorial Hall for Mar. 4.

The Symphony Club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., will open Monday, Oct. 22.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Conductor, Who Gives Double-Bass Recital Oct. 23.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
OCT 7

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Season Opened With Concerts Last Week.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opened its season in Boston last Friday night and Saturday afternoon, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Four new musicians were introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky this season. George Boettcher, the French horn virtuoso of Berlin, will head the horn section. The other new members are Y. Chardon, cello; N. Lauga, violin and L. White, percussion.

Pittsburgh is to be one of the first cities visited by the Boston Symphony this season, opening the orchestral season here on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2 and 3 at Syria mosque. Advance indications are that the symphony season here will surpass previous years in point of attendance, for in addition to the Boston orchestra, Pittsburgh is to be favored with three visits by the New York Philharmonic, with their leaders, Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini. The Chicago orchestra is also included for one evening concert, under Frederick Stock. Other favorites to return are the Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen.

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 9 - 1928

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard here in two concerts, opened its new season last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, at the Hub with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Hindesmith's Concerto for Orchestra Opus 38 and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony on the program. In this connection it is also to be stated that Mr. Koussevitzky, who for a time toured Europe, giving recitals on the double bass with great success, will display his virtuosity on this unusual solo instrument in a number of performances in the United States. The first of them is slated October 23.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
OCT 13 1928

Boston

Work is being rushed to complet the new Keith Memorial Theater for it early opening. The exact date has no yet been set, but it is now expected tha the premiere performance will be earl in November.

Four new musicians have joined th Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 48t season. They are Georg Boettche French horn virtuoso, from the Berli Royal Opera; Y. Chardon, cello; N Lauga, violin, and M. Lafosse, percussio

Joseph A. Cronin, publicity assistan at the Washington Street Olympia Thea ter, Boston, has returned to work aft a six months' illness.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 1 [redacted] 1928

Boston Symphony Here November 2-3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as leader will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. The programs include Apollon Musagete Ballet, Nocturnes by Debussy, prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica"; Cencerto Grosse for string orchestra, Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from "Tannhauser," "La Valse," Choreographic poem, and Symphony No. 2 in D major.

POST-GAZETTE
PITTSBURGH, PA.
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Here November 2-3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as leader will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. The programs include Apollon Musagete Ballet, Nocturnes by Debussy, prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica"; Cencerto Grosse for string orchestra, Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from "Tannhauser," "La Valse," Choreographic poem, and Symphony No. 2 in D major.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
OCT [redacted] 1928

CLEVELAND TOPICS
CLEVELAND, OHIO
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Due to unforseen construction delays in the new Music Hall of Public Auditorium, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on October 31st, will be given in Masonic Hall. This is to be the first presentation on the Cleveland Concert Course, the ensuing attractions being Maria Jeritza, Jascha Heifetz, Roland Hayes and Paul Whiteman and his Concert Orchestra.

Cleveland is fortunate in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only because of the supreme qualities of the organization

(Continued to page 50)
(Continued from page 42)

but because its engagements are strictly limited outside of the eighty-four concerts of the Boston and New York series. Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus and Pittsburgh are the only cities outside of Cleveland that will have an opportunity to hear the Orchestra.

Particular interest is attached to the visit, too, because of Koussevitzky who is considered to be one of the most brilliant of the world's orchestral conductors. This is to be his first Cleveland appearance.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
OCT 1 2 [redacted]

A Springfield merchant spent $1,000 a week to have his business mentioned in connection with the Boston symphony broadcasting in addition to royalties but concludes to desist this year. The charge of modernism is alleged as explanation why the concerts did not altogether "go" but while jazz is modern it is not that kind that was sent out by the great organization.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT [redacted] 1928

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give his [redacted] double bass recital in New York on October 23, in Carnegie hall.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 1 2 [redacted]

Serge Koussevitzky Greeted by Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has open[redacted] season in Boston with Serge Koussevitsky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critics, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitsky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

All this makes sure of a brilliant opening to the Symphony Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when the Boston and Koussevitsky come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 14 1928

Koussevitzky Here Next Month

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, leader, will open the symphony concert season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. Other orchestras to be heard in this course of seven evenings and six afternoons in Syria Mosque are the New York Philharmonic for three pairs, with Mengelberg and Toscanini conducting; the Chicago Orchestra, with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland Orchestra, with Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 14 1928

Orchestra Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra has opened its [redacted] season in Boston with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critiques, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitzky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAINDEALER

Because of unforeseen delays in the completion of the new Municipal Music Hall, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, schedul[redacted] the evening of Oct. 31, will be given instead in Masonic Hall on the same date.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Symphony [redacted] Orchestra Is Coming

There will be several new members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it appears here on January 29, as the third attraction in the artists' course of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody. This organization of 112 musicians is nearly fifty years old.

KOUSSEVITZKY TO PLAY IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky, who first played the double-bass in public upon receiving the degree of Doctor of Music from Brown University in Providence, wil lgive a double-bass recital, his second in America, in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday evening, Oct. 17th. at 8:30. He will make his New York debut as double-bass virtuoso in Carnegie Hall on the 23rd. of this month. These will be his only appearances of the season, for the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no time for outside activities.

Koussevitzky took up the bass as a a boy of 14 when, in the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to master some instrument. The first ten years of his career he toured Europe giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestras. His bass is a uperb product of Gironimo Amati, the great instrument maker of 17th. century Italy.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 13 [redacted]

Boston Symphony Here November 1

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will open the orchestral season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2, in Syria Mosque, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

193

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 7 -

Boston S... H...

...esent and

Blossom Seel

...the year ...d not reached C... ...ese are anxiously aw... ...nce the Boston will open the symphony season in Columbus Nov. 1 and Koussevitzky will make his first appe... ...entral Ohio.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is making preparations for starting its seat sale campaign.

Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia Ave., president of the Symphony Club, has called a meeting of all divisions of the organization at her home Monday at 2:30 p. m. Rev. Mr. McIlyar Hamilton Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will address the members on the merits of symphony music and the benefits derived from it in Columbus.

According to Helen Pugh Alcorn, executive secretary of the club and in charge of the seat sale, a record in the way of attendance at symphony concerts in Columbus will be established. Mrs. Alcorn draws her conclusions from the fact that more season tickets have been sold so far this season than have been during similar periods of previous years. Mrs. Alcorn is handling season reservations at her home, 34 Linwood Ave.

Three other concerts are in the symphony series. The Cincinnati, Fritz Reiner directing, is booked for Dec. 3; the Cleveland, with Nikolai Sokoloff as conductor, Feb. 4, and the ... Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Victor Kolar, is scheduled in Memorial Hall for Mar. 4.

The Symphony Club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., will open Monday, Oct. 22.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
17

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Season Opened With Concerts Last Week.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opened its season in Boston last Friday night and Saturday afternoon, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Four new musicians were introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky this season. George Boettcher, the French horn virtuoso of Berlin, will head the horn section. The other new members are Y. Chardon, cello; N. Lauga, violin and L. White, percussion.

Pittsburgh is to be one of the first cities visited by the Boston Symphony this season, opening the orchestral season here on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2 and 3 at Syria mosque. Advance indications are that the symphony season here will surpass previous years in point of attendance, for in addition to the Boston orchestra, Pittsburgh is to be favored with three visits by the New York Philharmonic, with their leaders, Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini. The Chicago orchestra is also included for one evening concert, under Frederick Stock. Other favorites to return are the Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

Boston Symphony ... Orchestra Is Coming

There will be several new members in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which appears here on January 29, as the third attraction in the artists' course of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody. This organization of 112 musicians is nearly fifty years old.

Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony Conductor, Who Gives Double-Bass Recital Oct. 23.

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 9 1928

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard here in two concerts, opened its new season last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, at the Hub with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Hindesmith's Concerto for Orchestra Opus 38 and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony on the program. In this connection it is also to be stated that Mr. Koussevitzky, who for a time toured Europe, giving recitals on the double bass with great success, will display his virtuosity on this unusual solo instrument in a number of performances in the United States. The first of them is slated October 23.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
OCT 13 1928

Boston

Work is being rushed to complet... the new Keith Memorial Theater for it... early opening. The exact date has no... yet been set, but it is now expected tha... the premiere performance will be early in November.

Four new musicians have joined th... Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 48t... season. They are Georg Boettche... French horn virtuoso, from the Berli... Royal Opera; Y. Chardon, cello; ... Lauga, violin, and M. Lafosse, percussor...

Joseph A. Cronin, publicity assistar... at the Washington Street Olympia Thea... ter, Boston, has returned to work aft... a six months' illness.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT

Boston Symphony Here November 2-3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as leader will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. The programs include Apollon Musagete Ballet, Nocturnes by Debussy, prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica"; Cencerto Grosse for string orchestra, Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from "Tannhauser," "La Valse," Choreographic poem, and Symphony No. 2 in D major.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
OCT ... 1928

KOUSSEVITZKY TO PLAY IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky, who first played the double-bass in public upon receiving the degree of Doctor of Music from Brown University in Providence, wil lgive a double-bass recital, his second in America, in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday evening, Oct. 17th. at 8:30. He will make his New York debut as double-bass virtuoso in Carnegie Hall on the 23rd. of this month. These will be his only appearances of the season, for the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no time for outside activities.

Koussevitzky took up the bass as a a boy of 14 when, in the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to master some instrument. The first ten years of his career he toured Europe giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestras. His bass is a uperb product of Gironimo Amati, the great instrument maker of 17th. century Italy.

CLEVELAND TOPICS
CLEVELAND, OHIO
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Due to unforseen construction delays in the new Music Hall of Public Auditorium, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on October 31st, will be given in Masonic Hall. This is to be the first presentation on the Cleveland Concert Course, the ensuing attractions being Maria Jeritza, Jascha Heifetz, Roland Hayes and Paul Whiteman and his Concert Orchestra.

Cleveland is fortunate in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only because of the supreme qualities of the organization

(Continued to page 50)
(Continued from page 42)

but because its engagements are strictly limited outside of the eighty-four concerts of the Boston and New York series. Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus and Pittsburgh are the only cities outside of Cleveland that will have an opportunity to hear the Orchestra.

Particular interest is attached to the visit, too, because of Koussevitzky who is considered to be one of the most brilliant of the world's orchestral conductors. This is to be his first Cleveland appearance.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 13 ...

Boston Symphony Here November 1

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will open the orchestral season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2, in Syria Mosque, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
OCT 2 ...

A Springfield merchant spent $1,000 a week to have his business mentioned in connection with the Boston symphony broadcasting in addition to royalties but concludes to desist this year. The charge of modernism is alleged as explanation why the concerts did not altogether "go" but while jazz is modern it is not that kind that was sent out by the great organization.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT ...

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give his ... double bass recital in New York on October 23, in Carnegie hall.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky Greeted by Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has open... season in Boston with Serge Koussevitsky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critics, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitsky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

All this makes sure of a brilliant opening to the Symphony Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when the Boston and Koussevitsky come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 14 1928

Koussevitzky Here Next Month

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, leader, will open the symphony concert season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. Other orchestras to be heard in this course of seven evenings and six afternoons in Syria Mosque are the New York Philharmonic for three pairs, with Mengelberg and Toscanini conducting; the Chicago Orchestra, with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland Orchestra, with Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT ... 1928

Orchestra Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra has opened its ... season in Boston with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critiques, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitzky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAINDEALER

Because of unforeseen delays in the completion of the new Municipal Music Hall, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for the evening of Oct. 31, will be given instead in Masonic Hall on the same date.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 7 - 1928

Boston S... H...

...esent and

Blossom Seel

...e year ...d not reached ... are anxiously aw... ...nce the Boston will open the symphony season in Columbus Nov. 1 and Koussevitzky will make his first appe... ...entral Ohio.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring its fifth season of symphony concerts in Columbus, is making preparations for starting its seat sale campaign.

Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 S. Columbia Ave., president of the Symphony Club, has called a meeting of all divisions of the organization at her home Monday at 4:30 p. m. Rev. Mr. McIlyar Hamilton Lichliter, pastor of the First Congregational Church, will address the members on the merits of symphony music and the benefits derived from it in Columbus.

According to Helen Pugh Alcorn, executive secretary of the club and in charge of the seat sale, a record in the way of attendance at symphony concerts in Columbus will be established. Mrs. Alcorn draws her conclusions from the fact that more season tickets have been sold so far this season than have been during similar periods of previous years. Mrs. Alcorn is handling season reservations at her home, 34 Linwood Ave.

Three other concerts are in the symphony series. The Cincinnati, Fritz Reiner directing, is booked for Dec. 3; the Cleveland, with Nikolai Sokoloff as conductor, Feb. 4, and the ... Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Victor Kolar, is scheduled in Memorial Hall for Mar. 4.

The Symphony Club's box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts., will open Monday, Oct. 22.

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Conductor, Who Gives Double-Bass Recital Oct. 23.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL COURIER
OCT 12 1928

A Springfield merchant spent $1,000 a week to have his business mentioned in connection with the Boston Symphony broadcasting in addition to royalties but concludes to desist this year. The charge of modernism is alleged as explanation why the concerts did not altogether "go" but while jazz is modern it is not that kind that was sent out by the great organization.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 13 1928

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give his ... double bass recital in New York on October 23, in Carnegie hall.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 14 1928

Serge Koussevitzky Greeted by Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has open... season in Boston with Serge Koussevitsky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critics, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitsky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

All this makes sure of a brilliant opening to the Symphony Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, when the Boston and Koussevitsky come to Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
OCT 7 - 1928

BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Season Opened With Concerts Last Week.

The Boston Symphony orchestra opened its season in Boston last Friday night and Saturday afternoon, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. Four new musicians were introduced by Mr. Koussevitzky this season. George Boettcher, the French horn virtuoso of Berlin, will head the horn section. The other new members are Y. Chardon, cello; N. Lauga, violin and L. White, percussion.

Pittsburgh is to be one of the first cities visited by the Boston Symphony this season, opening the orchestral season here on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2 and 3 at Syria mosque. Advance indications are that the symphony season here will surpass previous years in point of attendance, for in addition to the Boston orchestra, Pittsburgh is to be favored with three visits by the New York Philharmonic, with their leaders, Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini. The Chicago orchestra is also included for one evening concert, under Frederick Stock. Other favorites to return are the Cleveland orchestra, under Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis orchestra, under Henri Verbrugghen.

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 9 - 1928

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be heard here in two concerts, opened its new season last Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall, at the Hub with Serge Koussevitzky conducting and with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes," Hindesmith's Concerto for Orchestra Opus 38 and Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony on the program. In this connection it is also to be stated that Mr. Koussevitzky, who for a time toured Europe, giving recitals on the double bass with great success, will display his virtuosity on this unusual solo instrument in a number of performances in the United States. The first of them is slated October 23.

CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
OCT 13 1928

Boston

Work is being rushed to complet the new Keith Memorial Theater for it early opening. The exact date has no yet been set, but it is now expected tha the premiere performance will be early in November.

Four new musicians have joined th Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 48t season. They are Georg Böettche French horn virtuoso, from the Berli Royal Opera; Y. Chardon, cello; N Lauga, violin, and M. Lafosse, percusso

Joseph A. Cronin, publicity assistan at the Washington Street Olympia The ter, Boston, has returned to work aft a six months' illness.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Here November 2-3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as leader will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. The programs include Apollon Musagete Ballet, Nocturnes by Debussy, prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica"; Cencerto Grosse for string orchestra, Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from "Tannhauser," "La Valse," Choreographic poem, and Symphony No. 2 in D major.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 14 1928

Koussevitzky Here Next Month

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, leader, will open the symphony concert season in Pittsburgh Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. Other orchestras to be heard in this course of seven evenings and six afternoons in Syria Mosque are the New York Philharmonic for three pairs, with Mengelberg and Toscanini conducting; the Chicago Orchestra, with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland Orchestra, with Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis Orchestra, with Verbrugghen.

POST-GAZETTE
PITTSBURGH, PA.
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Here November 2-3

The Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky as leader will open the symphony season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 2 and 3. The programs include Apollon Musagete Ballet, Nocturnes by Debussy, prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica"; Cencerto Grosse for string orchestra, Bacchanale (Der Venusberg) from "Tannhauser," "La Valse," Choreographic poem, and Symphony No. 2 in D major.

CLEVELAND TOPICS
CLEVELAND, OHIO
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Due to unforseen construction delays in the new Music Hall of Public Auditorium, the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on October 31st, will be given in Masonic Hall. This is to be the first presentation on the Cleveland Concert Course, the ensuing attractions being Maria Jeritza, Jascha Heifetz, Roland Hayes and Paul Whiteman and his Concert Orchestra.

Cleveland is fortunate in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only because of the supreme qualities of the organization

(Continued to page 50)
(Continued from page 42)

but because its engagements are strictly limited outside of the eighty-four concerts of the Boston and New York series. Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus and Pittsburgh are the only cities outside of Cleveland that will have an opportunity to hear the Orchestra.

Particular interest is attached to the visit, too, because of Koussevitzky who is considered to be one of the most brilliant of the world's orchestral conductors. This is to be his first Cleveland appearance.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS
OCT 14 1928

Orchestra Series

The Boston Symphony orchestra has opened its ... season in Boston with Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program which, according to the newspaper critiques, is the most notable in the history of that famous body, auguring a season "the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history." This is the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitzky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage of Symphony Hall, he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAINDEALER
OCT 14 1928

Because of unforeseen delays in the completion of the new Municipal Music Hall, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, schedu... the evening of Oct. 31, will be given instead in Masonic Hall on the same date.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
OCT 13 1928

KOUSSEVITZKY TO PLAY IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitzky, who first played the double-bass in public upon receiving the degree of Doctor of Music from Brown University in Providence, will igive a double-bass recital, his second in America, in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday evening, Oct. 17th, at 8:30. He will make his New York debut as double-bass virtuoso in Carnegie Hall on the 23rd. of this month. These will be his only appearances of the season, for the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no time for outside activities.

Koussevitzky took up the bass as a a boy of 14 when, in the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to master some instrument. The first ten years of his career he toured Europe giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestras. His bass is a uperb product of Gironimo Amati, the great instrument maker of 17th. century Italy.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 13 1928

Boston Symphony Here November 1

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY will open the orchestral season in Pittsburgh on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, November 1 and 2, in Syria Mosque, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
OCT 2 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Coming

... several new members ... Symphony Orchestra ... here on January 29, ... third attraction in the artists' ... of five concerts presented by ... Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux ... organization of 112 mu... is nearly fifty years old.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 14 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S
DOUBLE BASS RECITAL

Serge Koussevitzky, who first played the double-bass in public upon receiving the degree of Doctor of Music from Brown University, will gave a double-bass recital, his second in America, in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock. He will make his New York debut as double-bass virtuoso in Carnegie Hall, on the 23rd of this month. These will be his only appearances of the season, for the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no time for [illegible] activities.

Koussevitzky took up the bass as a boy of 14, when, in the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to master some instrument. The first 10 years of his career he toured Europe, giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestra. His bass is a superb product of Gironimo Amati, the great instrument maker of the 17th century Italy. Europe still fondly remembers the recitals in which Koussevitzky and Casadesus played the 17th and 18th century music written for bass and viola d'amore.

Casadesus is coming from Europe especially to appear with Koussevitzky for the first time in America. The two musicians will play at their recital a "Symphonie Concertante" of Lorenziti and a Sonata of Borghi—both written for double-bass and viola d'amore duet. Another 18th century composition will be a little suite for viola d'amore, also by Lorenziti. Koussevitzky will play his own double-bass concerto and a group of shorter solo numbers, to include a "Valse miniature" also of his own composition.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
OCT 7 1928

When Koussevitzky Plays the Double Bass

One of the outstanding novelties of the season will be the appearance of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, in a recital of the double bass.

For the benefit of those who do not recognize the title of the instrument may we remind you of the big grandfather of the violin, played with the artist standing and bowing across the long, thick strings. Eight of the ten of the double basses are found in the back of the symphony orchestra.

A soloist double bass?

And the conductor of the Boston Symphony that soloist?

First it should be mentioned that in days gone by double bass soloists were many. It is only as changing musical conditions appeared that the double bass soloists disappeared. But there are still a few. And the greatest of them is Koussevitzky, but his recitals are necessarily infrequent because of his duties as conductor. As a matter of fact the recital on October 23 is only his second in America.

When Serge was 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory; that institution required for the orchestral class the study of a brass instrument or double bass—and Serge chose the latter. He studied under a great master and soon was recognized as a skilled artist, touring for ten years as virtuoso. He played his own concerto, which, by the way, will be heard at his New York recital.

Koussevitzky does not use a chamber instrument as did Bottesini, nor does he hold his bow 'cello fashion, as did that master of a century past. Koussevitzky's instrument, which he highly prizes, is a rare product of the illustrious seventeenth century family of Amati, of the brother Gironimo, to be exact. Only two others are known to exist. This bass is of full concert size and has four strings. Kousse-[illegible]ard, in [illegible]ayers. [illegible]or the eight-[illegible]th his [illegible]ember [illegible]turally [illegible]desus, [illegible]ments viola [illegible]rthed [illegible]os for which these [illegible]n to-Sas-[illegible]ap-[illegible]ica [illegible]will [illegible]Sam-[illegible]and [illegible]a for [illegible]uet. [illegible]si-[illegible]ola [illegible]own [illegible]ut of [illegible]de a [illegible]own

TRANSCRIPT
Buchold
B OCT 9 1928

Bostonian's Night Off.—Philip Ha[illegible] has been dramatic and music cri[illegible] of the Boston Herald for many yea[illegible] He had not been in New York [illegible] fifteen years until a few days a[illegible] As he was spending only one night [illegible] Gotham, picking his single enterta[illegible]ment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Sympho[illegible] concert at Carnegie Hall.—Variety

Inventor's Triumph.—

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

OCT [illegible]

BOSTON, Oct. 18.—Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past quarter century, is dead at his Jamaica Plain home in his 74th year.

Schroeder, who was widely known in musical circles, suffered a shock last Friday. He was a native of Germany, coming to Boston in 1891.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

Boston Symphony Opens Series B Monday, Oct. 29

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens concerts series B in the Eastman Theater on Monday night, Oct. 29, Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite will be one of the features of the program. Of the virtuoso performances by the orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, nothing has made a more remarkable impression than this composition of Ravel's.

When the famous French composer visited this country last year, Koussevitzky paid him the homage of a program consisting entirely of Ravel compositions. As the climax of the afternoon, "Daphnis and Chloe" was played and aroused the audience into according the composer, director and orchestra an ovation. Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer liveliness and grace, certain woodwin passages in "dawn" and "pantomime" of this suite have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas, and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes the suite.

To quote from Olin Downes of the New York Times: "Mr. Koussevitzky outdistanced any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the "Dahnis and Chloe" music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music, none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty from Ravel's orchestration." And Herman Devries, after the performance in Chicago by Koussevitzky and his orchestra, wrote in the Chicago American: "The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves of ecstacy. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgotten the presence of its neighbor, and the ego was lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty."

The rendition of "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first Rochester performance of this composition.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only event in Series B which has been scheduled for a night other than Friday, Monday being the only night on which the organization could appear in Rochester.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, at the head of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open the Buffalo Musical foundation's orchestra series Tuesday evening, Oct. 30, in Elmwood Music hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky will begin his program with a symphony and will end with a symphony. The opening number will be the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff. The final, the Brahms Symphony No. 2, in D major. Works of Debussy and Ravel also will appear on this program.

The Classical Symphony is not long, so the concert will come well within the usual time allowed for symphonic programs. Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores. This remark should not be taken solemnly, for it was probably made in the spirit of the music, which sparkles with verve and wit and insouciance. At any rate, in this symphony Prokofieff forgets his barbarians of ancient Scythia and his Babylonian demons. One finds here a pure, spontaneous, melodic vein, unconcealed by terrorisms. The Russian's high spirits and fertile invention play freely and delightfully within the boundaries of the orthodox 18th century form.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after a ten-minute intermission.

Nov. 15 will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the first appearance here of the newly merged New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony orchestras.

The Prague choir, composed of 60 singing teachers of the public and high schools of Czecho-Slovakia who have been giving concerts throughout Europe for the past 20 years, will sing in Elmwood Music hall in the Symphony series. The chorus has been persuaded by a committee of Czecho-Slovakian Americans to visit Canada and the United States in order to make us acquainted with the supreme Bohemian art of singing and with the works of their great composers, who are headed by such internationally known masters as Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek.

The Cleveland orchestra, with Sokoleff conducting, and the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham as conductor, add further glories to this season's symphon[illegible]

SUNDAY AMERICAN
ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Opening Series B Concert

IN a country from which have come some of the most colorful personalities and greatest artistic geniuses in history, Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, towers as one of the great musical figures which Russia has produced. Koussevitzky will again hold the baton when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes as the opening concert event in Series B in the Eastman on Monday night, October 29.

The circumstances surrounding the career of this eminent conductor and virtuoso are as engrossing as a narrative from the pen of Tolstoy. Koussevitzky first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in Northern Russia. Later, at the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument, and chose the double bass, and long before he was known as a conductor, had attained a considerable degree of fame on the continent as a soloist of distinction.

Deserting the limited field into which the double bass was leading him, Koussevitzky began in 1909 to devote his entire time to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

One of the most picturesque undertakings of his entire career resulted from his determination to take music to the people of Russia, to bring it himself into the midst of the great agrarian populations, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered an immense steamer, and cruising down the Volga River with his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group. Friends, traveled through 2,500 miles to its basin.

Conductor 4

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the brilliant young Russian, Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Orchestra will appear in concert at the Eastman next Monday night, October 29.

The Revolution sounded the doom for Koussevitzy's orchestra. With the downfall of the czarist regime came the dismemberment of the organization which had represented musical excellence in Russia. But though his beloved orchestra could exist no longer, the dynamic conductor of Koussevitzky would not be bound, and soon he became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, formerly the Court Orchestra.

Following brilliant triumphs on the continent Koussevitzky came to America in 1924 to assume the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under his inspiring guidance, this organization has attained a peak of musical excellence which brings it to the same high standard set by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and makes it one of the greatest musical organizations in the world.

Although all the other concert events in Series B are scheduled for Friday nights, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear on Monday, the change in the regular concert night having been necessitated by the orchestra's itinerary.

A limited number of seats are still available for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman box office.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Opening its program with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30th, at 8.15 o'clock, playing the first concert in the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The Boston will not only open its program with a symphony but will conclude with the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Brahms. Debussy and Ravel will also appear on this program of brilliant quality and generous proportions.

Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his "idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Of course, this remark should not be taken solemnly, for it was probably made in the spirit of the music, which sparkles with verve and wit, and insouciance.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after a ten-minute intermission.

November 15th will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the first appearance here of the newly merged New York Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS-PRESS
OCT [illegible]

Koussevitzky Orchestra to Be Heard October 31

Schmitt Version of Salome Doings, Respighi Concerto on Sokoloff Program Thursday.

By Archie Bell
Music Critic of The Cleveland News

DUE to construction delays in the new music hall of public auditorium, the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on Oct. 31, will be given in Masonic hall.

This is to be the first presentation on the Cleveland concert course, the ensuing attractions being Maria Jeritza, Jascha Heifetz, Roland Hayes and Paul Whiteman and his concert orchestra.

Cleveland is fortunate in the coming visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, not only because of the supreme qualities of the organization but because its engagements are strictly limited outside of the eighty-four concerts of the Boston and New York series. Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus and Pittsburgh are the only cities outside of Cleveland that will have an opportunity to hear the orchestra.

will present a group of Schubert's songs. Mr. Lautner comes to Cleveland with the acclamation of critics throughout the east who are familiar with his work. His program will consist of some of the best known of Schubert's compositions so arranged as to give a comprehensive appreciation of this composer's range of achievement.

The regular Sunday afternoon organ recitals will be played throughout the month of October by Edwin Arthur Kraft. These are given in the Garden Court at 5:30 and are open to the public.

* * *

[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

OCT [illegible]

ALWIN SCHROEDER, NOTED CELLIST, DEAD

Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra More Than 25 Years.

BOSTON, Oct. 18—Alwin Schroeder, who for more than 25 years was first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and well known in the musical world, died last night at his home, 94 Perkins Street, Jamaica Plain. He was 73 years old. He suffered a shock Friday and failed to rally.

Mr. Schroeder was born in Germany and came to the United States in 1891 to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the request of Maj. Higginson, who was then managing the orchestra. He played as first 'cellist and soloist for more than two decades. He also was a member of the Kneisel string quartet.

His daughter, who is now Mrs. Elfriede Hamblin of Brookline, inherited the musical talent of her father and for several seasons sang in the Boston Opera Company.

The musical world will regret deeply the death, in his 74th year, of Alwin Schroeder, long first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and also for many years a member of the Kneisel string quartet. Showing musical talent at a very early age, he played violin and viola as a child, and surprised everybody by converting himself rapidly into a 'cellist without instruction, becoming first 'cellist in Leipsic and then coming to Boston as solo 'cellist under Gericke. For a time he returned to Europe, expecting to make his home there, but found that his ties with America were too strong and he resumed his work in Boston. Like his associate, Franz Kneisel, he exerted a great influence in this country as a teacher. He continued at work almost to the last, and until a year or two ago kept his place at the first desk of the orchestra, besides now and then giving a recital which always attracted a warmly appreciative audience. A modest, kindly man, with a great gift for friendship, he was also a great artist with a fastidious purity of style.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 14 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY'S DOUBLE BASS RECITAL

Serge Koussevitzky, who first played the double-bass in public upon receiving the degree of Doctor of Music from Brown University, will gave a double-bass recital, his second in America, in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Wednesday evening at 8:30 o'clock. He will make his New York debut as double-bass virtuoso in Carnegie Hall, on the 23rd of this month. These will be his only appearances of the season, for the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no time for [illegible] activities.

Koussevitzky took up the bass as a boy of 14, when, in the Moscow Conservatory, he was required to master some instrument. The first 10 years of his career he toured Europe, giving recitals and playing his own double-bass concerto with orchestra. His bass is a superb product of Gironimo Amati, the great instrument maker of the 17th century Italy. Europe still fondly remembers the recitals in which Koussevitzky and Casadesus played the 17th and 18th century music written for bass and viola d'amore.

Casadesus is coming from Europe especially to appear with Koussevitzky for the first time in America. The two musicians will play at their recital a "Symphonie Concertante" of Lorenziti and a Sonata of Borghi—both written for double-bass and viola d'amore duet. Another 18th century composition will be a little suite for viola d'amore, also by Lorenziti. Koussevitzky will play his own double-bass concerto and a group of shorter solo numbers, to include a "Valse miniature" also of his own composition.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
News-PRESS

OCT [illegible]

Ko[illegible] to Schm[illegible]
C[illegible]

[illegible]tion picture, is being put into production in a New York studio. Crosland is the director and Gardner Sullivan is adapting I Berlin's original story. Also in Considine party will be camera and a complete production Richman will continue to pe on the Broadway stage in "G White's Scandals" while he is pearing before the lens and microphone.

D[illegible]
This [illegible] on the s ensuing Jeritza,
Hayes concert
Cleve
ing vis orchest supreme tion but strictly eighty-and Ne
Buffalo, are the land th
to hear the orchestra.

CIN
Playhouse
CONTINUOUS D OPENS
S
RICHARD

THIS CLIPPING FROM SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

OCT 19 [illegible]

ALWIN SCHROEDER, NOTED CELLIST, DEAD

Member of Boston Symphony Orchestra More Than 25 Years.

BOSTON, Oct. 18—Alwin Schroeder, who for more than 25 years was first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and well known in the musical world, died last night at his home, 94 Perkins Street, Jamaica Plain. He was 73 years old. He suffered a shock Friday and failed to rally.

Mr. Schroeder was born in Germany and came to the United States in 1891 to join the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the request of Maj. Higginson, who was then managing the orchestra. He played as first 'cellist and soloist for more than two decades. He also was a member of the Kneisel string quartet.

His daughter, who is now Mrs. Elfriede Hamblin of Brookline, inherited the musical talent of her father and for several seasons sang in the Boston Opera Company.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
OCT 17 1928

When Koussevitzky Plays the Double Bass

One of the outstanding novelties of the season will be the appearance of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, in a recital of the double bass.

For the benefit of those who do not recognize the title of the instrument may we remind you of the big grandfather of the violin, played with the artist standing and bowing across the long, thick strings. Eight of the ten of the double basses are found in the back of the symphony orchestra.

A soloist double bass?

And the conductor of the Boston Symphony that soloist?

First it should be mentioned that in days gone by double bass soloists were many. It is only as changing musical conditions appeared that the double bass soloists disappeared. But there are still a few. And the greatest of them is Koussevitzky, but his recitals are necessarily infrequent because of his duties as conductor. As a matter of fact the recital on October 23 is only his second in America.

When Serge was 14 he entered the Moscow Conservatory; that institution required for the orchestral class the study of a brass instrument or double bass—and Serge chose the latter. He studied under a great master and soon was recognized as a skilled artist, touring for ten years as virtuoso. He played his own concerto, which, by the way, will be heard at his New York recital.

Koussevitzky does not use a chamber instrument as did Bottesini, nor does he hold his bow 'cello fashion, as did that master of a century past. Koussevitzky's instrument, which he highly prizes, is a rare product of the illustrious seventeenth century family of Amati, of the brother Gironimo, to be exact. Only two others are known to exist. This bass is of full concert size and has four strings. Koussevitzky holds his bow palm forward, in the usual way of double bass players.

Koussevitzky's fondness for the music of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries is in accord with his devotion to this last surviving member of the viol family.

A common interest thus naturally allied him with Henri Casadesus, founder of the Société des Instruments Anciens and master of the viola d'amore. The two musicians unearthed together the sonatas and concertos for viola d'amore and double bass which had been composed in the era of these instruments. They played them together to the delight of Paris. Sasadesus is crossing from France to appear for the first time in America with his confrere.

Koussevitzky and Casadesus will play at their coming recital a "Symphonie Concertante" of Lorenziti and a Sonata of Borghi—both written for double bass and viola d'amore duet. Another eighteenth century composition will be a little suite for viola d'amore, also by Lorenziti.

Koussevitzky will play his own double bass concerto and a group of shorter solo numbers, to include a "Valse Miniature," also of his own composition.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

The musical world will regret deeply the death, in his 74th year, of Alwin Schroeder, long first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra and also for many years a member of the Kneisel string quartet. Showing musical talent at a very early age, he played violin and viola as a child, and surprised everybody by converting himself rapidly into a 'cellist without instruction, becoming first 'cellist in Leipsic and then coming to Boston as solo 'cellist under Gericke. For a time he returned to Europe, expecting to make his home there, but found that his ties with America were too strong and he resumed his work in Boston. Like his associate, Franz Kneisel, he exerted a great influence in this country as a teacher. He continued at work almost to the last, and until a year or two ago kept his place at the first desk of the orchestra, besides now and then giving a recital which always attracted a warmly appreciative audience. A modest, kindly man, with a great gift for friendship, he was also a great artist with a fastidious purity of style.

TRANSCRIPT
Rochester N Y
B OCT 19 1928

Bostonian's Night Off.—Philip Hale has been dramatic and music critic of the Boston Herald for many years. He had not been in New York for fifteen years until a few days ago. As he was spending only one night in Gotham, picking his single entertainment was a nice problem.

He chose the Boston Symphony concert at Carneige Hall.—Variety.

Inventor's Triumph.—

SOUTHBRIDGE, MASS.
NEWS

OCT [illegible]

BOSTON, Oct. 18.—Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past quarter century, is dead at his Jamaica Plain home in his 74th year.

Schroeder, who was widely known in musical circles, suffered a shock last Friday. He was a native of Germany, coming to Boston in 1891.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

Boston Symphony Opens Series B Monday, Oct. 29

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens concerts series B in the Eastman Theater on Monday night, Oct. 29, Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite will be one of the features of the program. Of the virtuoso performances by the orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, nothing has made a more remarkable impression than this composition of Ravel's.

When the famous French composer visited this country last year, Koussevitzky paid him the homage of a program consisting entirely of Ravel compositions. As the climax of the afternoon, "Daphnis and Chloe" was played and aroused the audience into according the composer, director and orchestra an ovation. Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer liveliness and grace, certain woodwin passages in "dawn" and "pantomime" of this suite have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas, and never did he use so broad a brush with such overwhelming effect as in the tumultuous dance which closes the suite.

To quote from Olin Downes of the New York Times: "Mr. Koussevitzky outdistanced any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the "Dahnis and Chloe" music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music, none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty from Ravel's orchestration." And Herman Devries, after the performance in Chicago by Koussevitzky and his orchestra, wrote in the Chicago American: "The audience was bled dry of emotion and nerves of ecstacy. The very silence of the audience was oppressive, a silence of rapt emotion, as though each human soul had forgotten the presence of its neighbor, and the ego was lost in this exhibition of matchless poetic beauty."

The rendition of "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be the first Rochester performance of this composition.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only event in Series B which has been scheduled for a night other than Friday, Monday being the only night on which the organization could appear in Rochester.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

[illegible] KOUSSEVITSKY, at the head [illegible] the Boston Symphony orchestra, [illegible]pen the Buffalo Musical foun[illegible]n's orchestra series Tuesday eve[illegible] Oct. 30, in Elmwood Music hall. [illegible] Koussevitzky will begin his pro[illegible] with a symphony and will end [illegible] a symphony. The opening num[illegible] will be the Classical Symphony of [illegible]kofieff. The final, the Brahms [illegible]phony No. 2, in D major. Works [illegible] Debussy and Ravel also will appear [illegible] this program.

The Classical Symphony is not long, so the concert will come well within the usual time allowed for symphonic programs. Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores. This remark should not be taken solemnly, for it was probably made in the spirit of the music, which sparkles with verve and wit and insouciance. At any rate, in this symphony Prokofieff forgets his barbarians of ancient Scythia and his Babylonian demons. One finds here a pure, spontaneous, melodic vein, unconcealed by terrorisms. The Russian's high spirits and fertile invention play freely and delightfully within the boundaries of the orthodox 18th century form.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after a ten-minute intermission.

Nov. 15 will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic-Symphony, the first appearance here of the newly merged New York Philharmonic and the New York Symphony orchestras.

The Prague choir, composed of 60 singing teachers of the public and high schools of Czecho-Slovakia who have been giving concerts throughout Europe for the past 20 years, will sing in Elmwood Music hall in the Symphony series. The chorus has been persuaded by a committee of Czecho-Slovakian Americans to visit Canada and the United States in order to make us acquainted with the supreme Bohemian art of singing and with the works of their great composers, who are headed by such internationally known masters as Smetana, Dvorak and Janacek.

The Cleveland orchestra, with Sokoloff conducting, and the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham as conductor, add further glories to this superb symphon[illegible]

SUN[illegible]
ROC[illegible]

Opening Series B Concert

IN a country from which have come some of the most colorful personalities and greatest artistic geniuses in history, Serge Koussevitzky, the brilliant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, towers as one of the great musical figures which Russia has produced. Koussevitzky will again hold the baton when the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes as the opening concert event in Series B in the Eastman on Monday night, October 29.

The circumstances surrounding the career of this eminent conductor and virtuoso are as engrossing as a narrative from the pen of Tolstoy. Koussevitzky first conducted as a boy of twelve, when he led the local theater orchestra at his birthplace in the province of Tver, in Northern Russia. Later, at the conservatory at Moscow, he was required to study an instrument, and chose the double bass, and long before he was known as a conductor, had attained a considerable degree of fame on the continent as a soloist of distinction.

Deserting the limited field into which the double bass was leading him, Koussevitzky began in 1909 to devote his entire time to conducting. He organized his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, which soon came to be considered the finest in Russia. In Moscow and Petrograd he conducted the classics, gave Beethoven, Bach, Tschaikowsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff and other festivals each season, and championed works by young composers then unknown but since accepted.

One of the most picturesque undertakings of his entire career resulted from his determination to take music to the people of Russia, to bring it himself into the midst of the great agrarian populations, most of whom had never heard a symphony concert. He chartered an immense steamer, and cruising down the Volga River with his entire orchestra, together with soloists and a group. Friends, traveled through 2,500 miles to its basin.

The Revolution sounded the doom for Koussevitzy's orchestra. With the downfall of the czarist regime came the dismemberment of the organization which had represented musical excellence in Russia. But though his beloved orchestra could exist no longer, the dynamic conductor of Koussevitzky would not be bound, and soon he became conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, formerly the Court Orchestra.

Following brilliant triumphs on the continent Koussevitzky came to America in 1924 to assume the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Under his inspiring guidance, this organization has attained a peak of musical excellence which brings it to the same high standard set by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and makes it one of the greatest musical organizations in the world.

Although all the other concert events in Series B are scheduled for Friday nights, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear on Monday, the change in the regular concert night having been necessitated by the orchestra's itinerary.

A limited number of seats are still available for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman box office.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Opening its program with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30th, at 8.15 o'clock, playing the first concert in the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The Boston will not only open its program with a symphony but will conclude with the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Brahms. Debussy and Ravel will also appear on this program of brilliant quality and generous proportions.

Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. Felix Borowski quotes the composer as saying that his "idea in writing this work was to catch the spirit of Mozart, and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." Of course, this remark should not be taken solemnly, for it was probably made in the spirit of the music, which sparkles with verve and wit, and insouciance.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after a ten-minute intermission.

November 15th will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic Symphony, the first appearance here of the newly merged New York Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras.

Conductor

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the brilliant young Russian, Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Orches[illegible] appear in concert at the Eastman next Monday night, October 29.

4

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

195 NEW YORK TIMES

ON VIRTUOSO CONDUCTING

Stokowski and His School—Three Leaders Who Stand Apart From Their Fellows—The Re-creation of Music

By OLIN DOWNES.

MR. LAWRENCE GILMAN, who touches only to adorn, remarked of Stokowski's recent concert with the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall that "there are possibly three conductors now living (some might say four) who impress one with a sense of that blend of consummate technical mastery, imaginative preparation and communicative power which is the hall-mark of the great conductor, and from this lonely group we see no valid reason for excluding Mr. Stokowski."

Why not, at least so far as America is concerned, make it a straight three? Why not mention their names? But we would not misrepresent Mr. Gilman. Possibly he has other names in mind than the ones which immediately emerge in our consciousness. There are three names which we are certain would get the straw vote of the adjacent musical public, and we are perfectly willing to reveal them. They are those of Stokowski, Koussevitzky and Toscanini. These three, each in his own way, wield a magic apparently irresistible to the majority of concertgoers of New York City. This statement is upheld by the crass evidence of the box office. With this majority vote on the part of the musical public we often disagree. In the present instance we unqualifiedly endorse it.

***

Now, it is true that all three of these men belong to that somewhat opprobrious type of musician known as "virtuoso conductor." The virtuoso conductor commonly connotes a brilliant if not pulchritudinous orchestra leader, who, with the aid of a tailor and a press agent, subjugates the public of the gallery and the boxes, too, while taking liberties of a more or less sensational kind with the scores he interprets. He is generally supposed to exalt his own ideas, his own pet gestures and orchestral effects above the just deserts of the composer. The element of the pernicious and sensational clings wickedly to him, and there is periodically expressed the desire that he and his kind might be swept for good and all from the boards and some good, steady, honest, reliable, respectful, probably fat and middle-aged conductor (by preference a family man) reign supreme over orchestral music and its destinies. Is this fair to the shining virtuoso person, the fêted visitor or "guest," who comes to lead a limited number of concerts, reap large financial and artistic rewards, and depart trailing glory, envy and malice behind him? We do not think it is entirely fair or exactly proportionate to give him this rating. Certainly, it is not fair if the three great musicians whom we have mentioned are to be included in such category. They are leaders of transcendent gifts, human, and therefore certain to err, but so great and so creative in their works and their influence in music that it would go hard with us, indeed, if we had to do without them.

***

How have they become "virtuoso conductors"? Why do they stand in such an isolated position in the public esteem? Why is it so hard to get tickets to their concerts and how much of it all is puffery? Suppose Mr. Stokowski were concealed from the audience by a screen. Would he keep his audience? How many in the audience would know the difference if Mr. Stokowski stepped behind the screen and his place were taken by some other eager seeker for public favor, who came from beneath the stage and emerged from back of the screen after the performance, bowing to the bewildered audience, like the magician's rabbit? Would the audience be put out of countenance? Some think that the audience would not know the difference. Others credit the public with this degree of discrimination, but explain the success of Mr. Stokowski and others of his ilk on the grounds of exaggerated, sensational methods of interpretation. Stokowski makes the broad and excessively heavy strokes, they say, that the most unimaginative and insensitive can grasp, whereas a finer grained performance would pass unnoticed by the multitude. And they bewail the lack of public passion for fine music for its own sake and wonder when orchestral concerts can be made a success without the presence of this objectionable but necessary person, the conductor who is a "virtuoso."

***

We are among those who have quarreled and do quarrel with the trade in guest conductors among our orchestras, with the constant whetting, by means of sensational publicity, of the public's curiosity about new conductors, who usually come and disappear without leaving a trace of their presence, save that they have disorganized the orchestra's routine somewhat and cost more money. We profess and maintain an abiding dislike and intolerance for the conductor who is an incompetent or a mere gesticulating charlatan. We believe, and always have believed, that the fewer conductors an orchestra has the better, and can furnish no better evidence of the support this principle receives in high quarters than the manner in which Mr. Koussevitzky continues to be the sole conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; the system according to which Mr. Stokowski, while his health permitted it, followed the same course with the Philadelphia Orchestra, and the fact of Mr. Toscanini's repeated and extended engagements as one of the two permanent conductors of the Philharmonic Symphony. But as to the artistic personalities, technical methods, capacities and ideals of the conductors chosen to train and to represent orchestras—that is another story. Our regret is not that there are so many Stokowskis, Koussevitzkys and Toscaninis extant, but so very few of them.

***

It is not so easy to reach eminence as a virtuoso conductor. It is not an easy or a negligible thing to thrill an audience by the performance of a familiar masterpiece, as Mr. Stokowski did the other evening. There are a few conductors who upset precedent and tower among their fellows, not because they misrepresent, but because they interpret music in a more vital, vivid, creative manner than their colleagues, gifted as many of these may be. There is no other reason for the special prominence today in the public eye of the three gentlemen we have mentioned. It has frequently and quite accurately reported of all of them—two of them in particular, Messrs. Koussevitzky and Stokowski, and in a lesser degree Mr. Toscanini—that they are capable of departing considerably in the letter, if not in the spirit, from the intention of composers whose music they discourse. How nearly can the most careful conductor follow a composer's wishes? How completely, at the very best, can he realize them? In the first place, no composer can fully indicate his ideas on music paper. The most careful directions that he can put on the score paper are only signposts of the most general kind. It is for the interpreter of intuitive insight, sympathy and evocative power to bridge the gap that lies between the printed score paper and actual music when it is sounded. Across that gap, like an electric spark, must leap the responsive and creative spirit of the performer. A composition is seldom or never performed exactly as the composer conceived it.

***

Incidentally, it would be interesting to compare the alleged transgressions, in the name of subjectivity, of certain conductors who are widely discussed and criticized for their sins of commission with the departures from precedent of colleagues who are counted saner and safer in their interpretive ideas, and assess the results of the calculation. Mr. Koussevitzky's distortion of the Schubert B minor symphony some years ago was certainly no worse or more pronounced than Mr. Mengelberg's variants of the same composer's symphony in C major. We can recall Mr. Furtwängler, commonly counted a classicist, playing ducks and drakes with Schumann's D minor symphony on the one hand and Stravinsky's "Sacre du printemps" on the other. We know of no modern conductor who has laid bolder or more ruthless hands on a well-known work than the hands that Frederick Stock, accounted an uncommonly safe and sane musician, has laid upon the silent and unprotesting score of Schumann's "Rheinish" symphony. It is easy to raise the hue and cry of sensationalism at the door of every conductor who departs from accepted convention and in so doing stirs the public. It is easy to praise for its modesty and self-abnegation a performance which does not even seek to discover the composer's thought and bring it home to the listener. The public is better guided by its instinct.

Music can be under—as well as over—played. A very high-minded and gifted conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under-played, devitalized Strauss or Berlioz fully as much as modern conductors are disposed to over-play Mozart. Who is to determine the degree of justness that the conductor has extended to the great departed? There were those, last Spring, who strongly objected to Ossip Gabrilowitsch's reading of the Bach St. Matthew Passion, which flew in the face of tradition. Yet, to a majority of listeners, this was one of the most moving and dramatic interpretations they had ever heard of Bach's score. Mr. Gabrilowitsch's reading, in fact, was instrumental in revealing to many who had never before been touched by the music, the intense humanity, the deep feeling and the wonderful beauty of the work. For once a conductor saw the score that Bach composed some three hundred years ago eye to eye with the present generation. He bridged the gap of the centuries, and a modern audience stirred to the music as it probably would not have done if Mr. Gabrilowitsch had followed the dead letter instead of the living spirit.

Place a great interpreter in contact with the ideas and emotions of a great composer and see what happens. Inevitably some process which precipitates the expression of two natures. If this precipitation does not take place, there can be at the best but a negative rendering of the sounds indicated by black notes on music paper. If, in the name of righteousness, the performer is going to stop at those boundaries he is never going to be the composer's prophet, and is never going to reveal the real essence of the music. He must follow the path as nearly as he can read the signs blazed through the forest. Then the signs come to an end, and he must strike forward alone for the ultimate destination. He is not very much of a man, he is not worthy of himself, if he still halts and waits for guidance. By this time he is aware of the way that he wants to go. He could not, if he would, keep his eyes to the ground any longer. The interpreter of stature must face the issue and share responsibility with the composer.

These principles, of course, as it was said of the theory of the self-determination of small nations, are loaded with dynamite for the stupid or self-complacent. But we are not talking now of the stupid or self-complacent, but of three great orchestral conductors. They have long since passed their apprenticeships. They have learned by the experience that develops the musician and shapes character. They have proved definitely that they have the right to their ideas, their inalienable independence of spirit, their proud and masterful evocation of great music.

To claim that the public only follows them because of fashion or sensation is not justice to a sound instinct of the public. The public instinctively wishes to come as close as it can to living art. It has neither the scholarship in a particular field nor the historical perspective to be able to assemble for itself the spirit of a great composition. That is the artist's task, to be carried out with the utmost scruple and reverence, but without slavishness or fear.

We owe conductors of true individuality and imagination an immense debt for their will, force and vision. They are indispensable to the consummation of the highest things in music. They make what is routine or pedestrian properly unendurable. They clear immense wastes of complacent slackness or mediocrity and confer upon us all access to new beauty.

NEW YORK TIMES

MASTER OF BASS-VIOL

Koussevitzky as Soloist on Most Ponderous Of Instruments—His Artistic Ancestors

THE appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as a solo performer on the double bass this week at Carnegie Hall will be a unique event in the musical annals of New York. It can be said in advance that those who are at a loss to understand how this ponderous instrument can be made the vehicle for the expression of soulful and pleasing music have a great surprise in store for them. I have heard Koussevitzky play the double bass in public many times in Europe and I never knew him to fail to delight his audiences with his warm cantabile as well as to astonish them with his wonderful virtuosity, a virtuosity comparable to that of Pablo Casals on the 'cello.

It must be admitted, however, that the double bass was not conceived as a solo instrument. It is the backbone, the very foundation of the orchestra, and is an indispensable instrument in all symphonic or operatic compositions, but it offers so little that is alluring from the virtuoso point of view that for the average player it is non-existent for solo purposes. Only at rare intervals, once or twice in a century, does some exceptional genius arise who is capable of transforming this leviathan of the strings into a living, throbbing thing of beauty. The double bass has existed in its present form for more than three hundred years. The most famous example of this stringed Titan, Dragonetti's Casparo da Salo, now preserved in the chapel of St. Mark's Cathedral in Venice, was made before the year 1600, and yet in the whole history of the double bass there have been only three men who have attained world-wide fame as solo performers on the instrument—Domenico Dragonetti, Giovanni Bottesini and Serge Koussevitzky. True, there have been other solo players like Laska, Mandenski, Cammi and Goedecke, who have won local fame in their own countries, but only the three above mentioned have possessed that transcendental genius for the unwieldy instrument that enabled them to attain world renown.

***

Among the most ardent admirers of Dragonetti's art on the double bass were Haydn, Beethoven, Berlioz, Viotti, Paganini, Sivori and Rossini. Beethoven in particular was astonished and delighted anew every time he heard the Italian's remarkable execution on the double bass. It was his tone and technique, his warmth and fire, that inspired the Bonn master to compose the famous passage for double basses in the scherzo of his C minor symphony. And Beethoven never tired of hearing Dragonetti play in ensemble the 'cello parts of his string quartets, which he executed just as written with all the high notes. But probably the Italian's phenomenal powers were never demonstrated in a more remarkable manner than in his duet playing with Viotti, the greatest violinist of his day. This was just prior to the advent of Spohr and Paganini.

No one could understand how it was possible for Dragonetti to bring out all the high notes of the violin clef with such clearness. Later in Venice Dragonetti explained to Caffi the secret. Because of the enormous strength and stretch of his left hand and because of his remarkable use of the thumb in fingering, he developed a system of artificial harmonics high up on the finger board, producing tones that sounded for all the world like a violin. Dragonetti employed a bridge fully twice the height of the ordinary and he used unusually thick strings, thus being able to bring out effects that no one else could produce. In fact, Caffi relates of attempts on the part of others to play on Dragonetti's bass, and he said that the blood actually spurted from the finger tips because of the pressure they had to bring to bear.

***

Dragonetti's instrument was a Casparo da Salo. This has remained the most famous double bass in the world. Dragonetti and his instrument were inseparable companions for more than sixty years. He was several times offered fabulous sums for the instrument which had attained to such fame under his manipulation, but he invariably replied that he would sooner part with his left hand than with his old stringed friend, which so wonderfully responded to his every mood. In 1794, at the age of 31, he settled in London, where he spent the remainder of his days, making, however, frequent visits to the Continent. In 1845 at the age of 82 we find him, still vigorous, leading the thirteen double basses of the immense orchestra of picked musicians which played at the great Beethoven festival at Bonn. Hector Berlioz, who was present, writes in his "Soirées de l'orchestre" with the greatest enthusiasm of Dragonetti's playing, saying: "I have never heard the scherzo of the Fifth Symphony by Beethoven played with such force and perfection." In his will, which is a very quaint and interesting document, Dragonetti bequeathed his beloved instrument to St. Mark's Cathedral, where it is still played on special occasions. I saw it there when on a visit to Venice about fifteen years ago.

***

The second great master of the double bass, Bottesini, had during nearly half a century a success as virtuoso similar to that which his illustrious countryman, Paganini, had on the violin. He was the only one of the great double-bass players who traveled and played all his life, leading a virtuoso's career. He was noted for his brilliant virtuoso technique and for his soulful tone as well as for his fire and élan. In public he played his own compositions exclusively. Old programs of his show that the greatest public favorites among his many works were his "Gran Duo Concertant" for violin and double bass, his Fantasy on themes from Bellini's opera "I Puritani," his "Tarantella" and his "Carnival of Venice." These were the compositions in which his powers of execution were most brilliantly displayed. Violinists like Vieuxtemps, Bazzini, Sivori, Wieniawski and Sauret were proud to be his partner in this celebrated duo. It is to be hoped that Koussevitzky, if he gives a second recital, will afford New York an opportunity to hear this once so famous composition. To be sure, it is only a show piece, having little real musical value, but it is melodious, brilliant and effective, and it develops many purely instrumental features of the violin and double bass in a characteristic manner. New York would certainly be interested in hearing the piece that was renowned throughout the length and breadth of the Continent sixty years ago. I have never heard it in public, but I once heard Koussevitzky play it at his home in Berlin with the assistance of Jacques Thibaud, who read the difficult violin part at sight, and of Fritz Kreisler at the piano.

Bottesini also composed many operas which were performed in public, principally in Italy, with success. He himself frequently conducted opera not only in his native country but also in Paris, Mexico, Havana, Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires. His most successful opera was "Hero and Leander," for which his friend, Arrigo Boito, wrote the libretto. All these works, however, have long since been forgotten. His chief interest was always for the double bass. His beloved instrument, a Testore, had remarkable tonal powers. Like Dragonetti, he played on heavy strings and with a very high bridge. Furthermore, he always thoroughly oiled his strings before a concert in order to insure smooth portamenti. He spent the last years of his life at Parma, where he died in 1889, aged 68. His grave at his own request was dug close to that of Paganini, who also spent the last years of his life on his beautiful estate at Parma. Thus do the two illustrious Italian instrumentalists lie side by side in their native soil.

***

To come closer to the present, I distinctly remember the furor that Koussevitzky created in Berlin twenty-seven years ago, on the occasion of his début at the venerable Singakademie, as double-bass virtuoso. Even in concert-ridden Berlin, then the musical centre of the world, a recital on the double bass was an event such as had not been heard of since the palmy days of Bottesini. But the youthful, aristocratic-looking young Russian outdid his great Italian predecessor in one respect, for he played on a regular orchestral bass with four strings tuned to fourths, in the regulation orchestral manner, whereas Bottesini played a three-stringed bass tuned to fifths and pitched a whole tone higher to insure greater brilliancy.

Originally Koussevitzky, curiously enough, did not take up the double bass from choice but from necessity, and how he later became enamored of the instrument is an interesting story. Born at Wyschni Wolotschek in the Province of Twer, on the Volga, on June 13, 1874, he came to Moscow in 1880, as a youth of 16, with the intention of entering the Imperial Conservatory, of which Nicholas Rubinstein, the brother of the world-famous Anton, was then director, as a student of theory and composition. But Koussevitzky was too poor to pay the very moderate tuition fees, so his only chance of getting into the institution was through a scholarship. It happened that the only scholarship available was for the double bass; therefore, in order to be enrolled as a student, he was obliged to take up the study of that instrument.

His teacher, Josef Rambousek, who was quite a remarkable musician, at once recognized the genius of his new pupil, and he soon succeeded in rousing in him the keenest interest in this huge member of the viol family, with the result that the pupil finally outshone the master. He grew to be so enamored of the double bass that he first became its slave and finally its master.

It was not until 1906 that Koussevitzky took up conducting, for which he always had a strong inclination. I well remember his first attempts with an orchestra recruited from among the pupils of the Berlin Royal High School. He progressed rapidly and was soon able to make his public début. Then for several seasons he gave a series of concerts with all Russian programs with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, introducing to Germany many then unknown works that have since become famous. In 1909 he returned to Moscow, where he founded his own private orchestra of seventy-three musicians picked from the best talent available in Russia and other countries. Thus he was free to rehearse to his heart's content and to gain the experience which was later to stand him in such good stead.

ARTHUR M. ABELL.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Boston Symphony's Career of Forty-Seven Years Reviewed

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to the Eastman Theater on Monday night, Oct. 29, have elicited the praise of the nation's foremost critics. Back of its present eminence is the story of a development that is an inspiring record of achievement and of a civic pride that is finding its counterpart in Rochester today in the support and encouragement of being given to this city's own orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic.

In 1881 the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no exuense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only 60 players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programs, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the orchestra's special and permanent home.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1885-89 and 1898-1906). Through years of tireless training this thorough and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has since held its special renown. In the interim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauler, who conducted through 1893-98.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which were held by Max Fiedler. To Dr. Muck's exacting hand the great orchestra responded like a single, marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony next had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer, now head of the Paris Conservatoire, and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finelly blended ensemble.

In the Autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Ro[illegible] concert, first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Europe had come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and as an artist.

Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all of the "great" conductors living, has found qualities in Koussevitzky's leadership which are said to be quite without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

Seats for the performance by the Boston Symphony are now selling at the Eastman concert box office.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

look starts low. The layman, observing crowded houses at symphony and opera, has been told frequently that even so the box office cannot meet the pay envelope. Sponsors and backers have to make up the deficit.

In the case of the Boston Symphony, the Boston Globe reports that all the season tickets for both Fridays and Saturdays were sold last spring, the people on the waiting list taking the small number of places not re-engaged by last season's subscribers. For next season there is already a long waiting list.

Yet the program books of the opening week, the Globe noted, contain an appeal from the trustees for contributions toward an estimated deficit of $134,000 on the current season. This figure, the largest in the history of the orchestra, is produced by an increase in orchestra salaries and by the fact that the broadcasting privilege, for which $32,000 was paid last year, has not been sold this year. Last year's actual deficit is now announced as $87,068.23. It was estimated at $85,000, and contributions of $73,179 were made toward it.

The trustees again remind the public that "These concerts can be carried on only by the generosity of the public." Subscriptions should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon street, Boston.

Whatever the financial result, there is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Here October 30

Opening its program with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30, at 8:15 o'clock, playing the first concert in the Symphony Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The Boston will not only open its program with a symphony but will conclude with the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Brahms.

Debussy and Ravel will also appear on this program of brilliant quality and generous proportions.

The Classical Symphony is not long, so that the concert will come well within the usual time allowed for symphonic programs. Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of the contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. The music sparkles with verve and wit, and insouciance.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after aten-minute intermission.

November 15th will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras.

Among other music to be played by Mr. Mengelberg is the fascinating Till Eulenspiegal of Strauss.

The Prague Choir, composed of 60 singing teachers of the public and high schools of Czecvho-Slovakia, will sing in Elmwood Music Hall in the Symphony Series.

[illegible] Orchestra with Soko-[illegible]

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

March on a Theme by Handel...Guilmant

ORCHESTRA CONCERTS

Boston Symphony Here Early In November.

But a few days remain in which to procure season tickets for the series of symphony orchestra concerts, including the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, Minneapolis orchestra and Cleveland orchestra. These orchestras come to Pittsburgh for a series of seven nights and six afternoons during the fall and winter season at Syria mosque, with their complete personnel and distinguished conductors.

The opening concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2 and 3, and Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared two interesting programs, opening with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete, Ballet," followed by Debussy's "Nocturnes," Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica." On Saturday afternoon, the works to be given include Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra; Wagner's "Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser;" "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem, by Ravel, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

An Orchestra's Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a national institution and a record of its activities is of more than local interest in Boston. The list of bookings for the forty-eighth season of the orchestra's existence is at hand and Hartford—on the list for one concert only, on February 3, 1929—may read with somewhat selfish satisfaction, perhaps, that many larger cities are not more favored by the Boston players.

Primarily, of course, the orchestra is of Boston and that city will have sixty-four of its scheduled 108 concerts, all 64 being given in the fine Symphony Hall there. Neighboring Cambridge, at Sanders Theater, will hear nine concerts and the New York and Brooklyn appearances of the orchestra number fifteen in all, Brooklyn having five. The New York concerts are given in "pairs" always, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, and Brooklyn hears the orchestra on the intervening Friday evenings.

Providence is blessed with four concerts during the season, Baltimore, Washington and Pittsburgh with two each and in the single concert class with Hartford are Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Richmond, Montclair, New Haven, Springfield and Northampton. It will be understood, of course, that tours farther afield might readily be arranged for an orchestra of the standing of the famous Boston organization, but the matter of transportation and hotel expenses must be considered and tours are being restricted, more and more, each year.

Hartford is fortunate in having the one concert allotted it. That one concert is possible only as a matter of a "stop-over" between New York and Boston. The hundred and ten players with their instruments and baggage travel by special train and the Sunday afternoon concert here comes between the New York Saturday afternoon performance and that in Boston on Tuesday evening; the orchestra does not, of course, give concerts every day in any week except when it is on its Western and Southern tours.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its 48th Season

Hartford Concert Scheduled for Feb. 3. Tickets Go On Sale This Week

The historic Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday, its 48th season. From the evidence of this concert, the coming season may well exceed in brilliance and beauty, in virtuosity and artistic attainment the most glorious seasons of its long and illustrious past. This was the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitzky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage, he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

The music critics of Boston thus described the occasion in the newspapers of October 6.

Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe: "There is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history. The Boston Symphony remains an orchestra unsurpassed by any in the world in the number of first-rate players it contains. Not half a dozen bands can compare with it."

The Hartford concert will be February 3, at the Capitol Theater. The preliminary ticket sale is announced by Frank A. Sedgwick, at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch

Symphony Sale Starts

Box office sale of season tickets for the series of symphony concerts in Memorial hall, sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, began at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday morning. The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the series on Nov. 1. Other concerts are: the Cincinnati orchestra, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, March 4. Unpaid for reservations will be held at the box office until Thursday only.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MUSICAL NOTES

New Pieces at Boston Symphony

Two new pieces were introduced a recent Boston Symphony concert. The novelties were suites from Stravinsky's latest ballet, "Apollo Leader of the Muses," and Zotan Kodalsky's opera, "Hary Janos." The Appolo was first performed at the chamber music festival of the Library of Congress in Washington last April, and has since been given in London and Paris as a ballet. The suite suggests the opera ballet music of the 18th and 19th centuries; but there is a reminiscence of plain song as well as of Johann Strauss, of Pergolese and Tchaikowsky, and worn, it is said in Stravinsky's own manner. The grave defect is not lack of conventionality, but lack of emotional intensity and driving power. The apotheosis at the end seems much like memorial music.

The Kodalky suite is of fragments from the opera, Hary Janos, whose tales of his prodigious adventures recall those of Munchausen, or the Paul Bunyan of the American Northwest. The music is brilliantly scored for full modern orchestra in which the pianoforte is very skillfuly used. Themes are said to be taken from Hungarian popular music before it was influenced by Gypsy music. It is tuneful, sprightly, and ought to become a permanent part of orchestral repertory.

SUN
LEWISTON, ME.
OCT 22 1928

MUSICAL NOTES

New Pieces at Boston Symphony

Two new pieces were introduced at a recent Boston Symphony concert. The novelties were suites from Stravinsky's latest ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," and Zotan Kodalsky's opera, "Hary Janos." The Appolo was first performed at the chamber music festival of the Library of Congress in Washington last April, and has since been given in London and Paris as a ballet. The suite suggests the opera ballet music of the 18th and 19th centuries; but there is a reminiscence of plain song as well as of Johann Strauss, of Pergolese and Tchaikowsky, and worn, it is said in Stravinsky's own manner. The grave defect is not lack of conventionality, but lack of emotional intensity and driving power. The apotheosis at the end seems much like memorial music.

The Kodalky suite is of fragments from the opera, Hary Janos, whose tales of his prodigious adventures recall those of Munchausen, or the Paul Bunyan of the American Northwest. The music is brilliantly scored for full modern orchestra in which the pianoforte is very skillfuly used. Themes are said to be taken from Hungarian popular music before it was influenced by Gypsy music. It is tuneful, sprightly, and ought to become a permanent part of orchestral repertory.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

Seat Sale.

The box office sale of season tickets for the Symphony Club's series of orchestra concerts in Memorial Hall opens this morning at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the series on Thursday, Nov. 1. Unpaid reservation will be held at the box office until Thursday.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 23 1928

He Places Boston Orchestra High

Arthur M. Abell, writing in Musical Courier, pays Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra which he directs, his highest compliment. The Boston orchestra and Koussevitzky will open the Symphony club series of concerts at Memorial hall, Thursday, Nov. 1.

"Today we have in America many fine orchestras and four of them are organizations of the first rank—the Boston, New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras," writes Abell.

"Opinions vary as to which is the greatest, but for me (and I write from a New Yorker's viewpoint) the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitzky, leads for all-around technical perfection, tonal beauty, resonance, instrumental balance and general excellence of ensemble."

Seats for the entire series of concerts are on sale at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

Koussevitzky Gives Concert on His Bass Fiddle

By IRVING WEIL.

Probably the oddest concert that this season is likely to produce took place last night in Carnegie Hall. It was the long promised performance by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the contrabass or, being a bit vulgar, the bull fiddle. And, to make the affair the more unusual, he had to help him, Henri Casadesus, the most expert living player on the viola d'amore, an almost obsolete relic of a bygone age.

There was a very large and what is conveniently called a distinguished audience gathered to listen to these two virtuosi, although one noticed a few empty seats here and there in the hall. About all the violinists, pianists, cellists and sundries who happen now to be in town were among those present, for there could be no heart-burnings in observing someone's else enormous skill on a contrabass and a viola d'amore. These are scarcely competitive instruments.

TOURED EUROPE.

Mr. Koussevitzky's fondness for the bass fiddle goes back to his boyhood, for he began playing it when he was fourteen; and, as everybody now knows, he used to tour the whole of Europe with his instrument before he settled down as an orchestral conductor. Abroad he is known as the successor of Dragonetti and Bottesini, the two names always associated with greatest prowess on the big viol. We suppose they were able to do all the things that can be done to a contrabass; in any case, contemporary accounts in the late eighteenth and the middle nineteenth centuries say they were. But Mr. Koussevitzky last night seemed to be gracefully and completely able to do them too.

One of them is to make the bass viol sound as much as possible like a cello, just as the cellist tries to make his instrument sound as much as possible like a violin. This is achieved with a smooth tone in the highest position, which means accomplishing the feat of bending down over the giant length of the contrabass as though the player were about to kiss it on the bridge. And when that isn't enough, there are harmonics, another of the pretty difficulties. Bowing agility, without giving the impression of capering tone, is still another.

MUSIC SCARCE.

All these things Mr. Koussevitzky managed with suavity and ease. But he could not create what does not exist; that is to say, music of either value or interest devised for the contrabass—not even by writing some of it himself. He and Mr. Casadesus dug up a symphony concertante and a sonata for viola d'amore and contrabass, the one by Lorenziti and the other by Borghi, two otherwise completely forgotten worthies of the eighteenth century, but a little of them went a long, long way. Mr. Koussevitzky also played a concerto and a "Miniature Waltz" of his own.

The concerto need not be seriously held against him, for it was a youthful offense— and sounded like it. But it did give him a chance to show what an exquisite, pure tone he can draw with his bow. There were also a few other matters, but equally of no importance as music.

Mr. Casadesus, who is the head of the Society of Ancient Instruments of Paris, came all the way over here for this concert. His art on the viola d'amore is as beautiful as the name of the instrument. And this antique must have its secret trials for the executant, for it possesses seven bowed strings and seven others that sound sympathetically when the first set give forth certain notes. The tone is thus something like that of a harpsichord without the plucked effect. A charming instrument, but it, too, is quickly bedeviled by monotony.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

Serge Koussevitzky

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, has been criticized in Boston and New York for his introduction and playing of works of modern composers. He considers this music beautiful and representative and is making every effort to popularize it. The orchestra plays here Nov. 1 in Memorial Hall. The box office is at the Carl Koch Co., 102 E. Broad St.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Taught Arts and Industry

The superlative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which comes to the Eastman Theater on Monday night, Oct. 29, have elicited the praise of the nation's foremost critics. Back of its present eminence is the story of a development that is an inspiring record of achievement and of a civic pride that is finding its counterpart in Rochester today in the support and encouragement of being given to this city's own orchestra, the Rochester Philharmonic.

In 1881 the late Maj. Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full-sized symphony orchestra—a rare phenomenon in those days. This noted musician, soldier, financier and public-spirited citizen believed that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no exuense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill up its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its original form had only 60 players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims (always since adhered to) were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra, and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic considerations should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programs, even the venture itself were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. In 1900 Symphony Hall was built, to become the orchestra's special and permanent home.

The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, had two terms (1885-89 and 1898-1906). Through years of tireless training this thorough and arduous musician gradually built up the fine ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has since held its special renown. In the interim of Gericke's periods of service came Arthur Nikisch, the great Hungarian leader, and Emil Pauler, who conducted through 1893-98.

Dr. Karl Muck was the conductor from 1906 to 1918, with the exception of the years 1908-12, which were held by Max Fiedler. To Dr. Muck's exacting hand the great orchestra responded like a single, marvelously perfect instrument.

The Boston Symphony next had two French conductors—Henri Rabaud in the season of 1918-19, a distinguished musician and composer, now head of the Paris Conservatoire, and Pierre Monteux (1919-24), who ably carried on the then established tradition of a finelly blended ensemble.

In the Autumn of 1924, Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Roc[illegible] concert, first crossed the Atlantic to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Europe had come many reports of his remarkable qualities as a leader and as an artist.

Expectations were more than fulfilled. America, having heard perhaps all of the "great" conductors living, has found qualities in Koussevitzky's leadership which are said to be quite without equal.

With such a combination of a great orchestra and a great leader, it is not surprising that a Boston Symphony concert is regarded as one of the finest achievements in the musical performances of our day. There are waiting lists for every subscription series, and seats for any concert are at a premium.

Seats for the performance by the Boston Symphony are now selling at the Eastman concert box office.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

SYMPHONY'S ART HIGH
BUT FINANCES LOW.

Although the reviewers of the opening of the Boston Symphony's new season predicted that it looked like the most brilliant musically in the history of the organization, the financial outlook starts low. The layman, observing crowded houses at symphony and opera, has been told frequently that even so the box office cannot meet the pay envelope. Sponsors and backers have to make up the deficit.

In the case of the Boston Symphony, the Boston Globe reports that all the season tickets for both Fridays and Saturdays were sold last spring, the people on the waiting list taking the small number of places not re-engaged by last season's subscribers. For next season there is already a long waiting list.

Yet the program books of the opening week, the Globe noted, contain an appeal from the trustees for contributions toward an estimated deficit of $134,000 on the current season. This figure, the largest in the history of the orchestra, is produced by an increase in orchestra salaries and by the fact that the broadcasting privilege, for which $32,000 was paid last year, has not been sold this year. Last year's actual deficit is now announced as $87,068.23. It was estimated at $85,000, and contributions of $73,179 were made toward it.

The trustees again remind the public that "These concerts can be carried on only by the generosity of the public." Subscriptions should be sent to E. B. Dane, treasurer, at 6 Beacon street, Boston.

Whatever the financial result, there is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

Boston Symphony Here October 30

Opening its program with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in Elmwood Music Hall on Tuesday evening, October 30, at 8:15 o'clock, playing the first concert in the Symphony Series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation. The Boston will not only open its program with a symphony but will conclude with the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Brahms.

Debussy and Ravel will also appear on this program of brilliant quality and generous proportions.

The Classical Symphony is not long, so that the concert will come well within the usual time allowed for symphonic programs. Serge Prokofieff, the "enfant terrible" of the contemporary Russian music, shows himself in an amiable mood in this little work, composed in 1916-17. The music sparkles with verve and wit, and insouciance.

The big symphony of the evening, the Brahms Second, will be played at the end, after aten-minute intermission.

November 15th will bring the great Holland conductor, Willem Mengelberg, with the Philharmonic and New York Symphony orchestras.

Among other music to be played by Mr. Mengelberg is the fascinating Till Eulenspiegal of Strauss.

The Prague Choir, composed of 60 singing teachers of the public and high schools of Czecvho-Slovakia, will sing in Elmwood Music Hall in the Symphony Series.

The Cleveland Orchestra with Sokoloff conducting and the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham as conductors, add further glories to this symphonic series.

[illegible] Early in November.

But a few days remain in which to procure season tickets for the series of symphony orchestra concerts, including the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Chicago Symphony, Minneapolis orchestra and Cleveland orchestra. These orchestras come to Pittsburgh for a series of seven nights and six afternoons during the fall and winter season at Syria mosque, with their complete personnel and distinguished conductors.

The opening concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Friday night and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 2 and 3, and Mr. Koussevitzky has prepared two interesting programs, opening with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete, Ballet," followed by Debussy's "Nocturnes," Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," and Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica." On Saturday afternoon, the works to be given include Handel's Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra; Wagner's "Bacchanale" from "Tannhauser;" "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem, by Ravel, and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

An Orchestra's Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has become a national institution and a record of its activities is of more than local interest in Boston. The list of bookings for the forty-eighth season of the orchestra's existence is at hand and Hartford—on the list for one concert only, on February 3, 1929—may read with somewhat selfish satisfaction, perhaps, that many larger cities are not more favored by the Boston players.

Primarily, of course, the orchestra is of Boston and that city will have sixty-four of its scheduled 108 concerts, all 64 being given in the fine Symphony Hall there. Neighboring Cambridge, at Sanders Theater, will hear nine concerts and the New York and Brooklyn appearances of the orchestra number fifteen in all, Brooklyn having five. The New York concerts are given in "pairs" always, on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons, and Brooklyn hears the orchestra on the intervening Friday evenings.

Providence is blessed with four concerts during the season, Baltimore, Washington and Pittsburgh with two each and in the single concert class with Hartford are Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Richmond, Montclair, New Haven, Springfield and Northampton. It will be understood, of course, that tours farther afield might readily be arranged for an orchestra of the standing of the famous Boston organization, but the matter of transportation and hotel expenses must be considered and tours are being restricted, more and more, each year.

Hartford is fortunate in having the one concert allotted it. That one concert is possible only as a matter of a "stop-over" between New York and Boston. The hundred and ten players with their instruments and baggage travel by special train and the Sunday afternoon concert here comes between the New York Saturday afternoon performance and that in Boston on Tuesday evening; the orchestra does not, of course, give concerts every day in any week except when it is on its Western and Southern tours.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its 48th Season

Hartford Concert Scheduled for Feb. 3. Tickets Go On Sale This Week

The historic Boston Symphony Orchestra opened in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday, its 48th season. From the evidence of this concert, the coming season may well exceed in brilliance and beauty, in virtuosity and artistic attainment the most glorious seasons of its long and illustrious past. This was the fifth season to be opened by Serge Koussevitzky. When the distinguished Russian conductor stepped upon the stage, he was greeted with a long ovation from a standing audience and a standing orchestra.

The music critics of Boston thus described the occasion in the newspapers of October 6.

Penfield Roberts of the Boston Globe: "There is no doubt that this season will be among the most brilliant artistically in the orchestra's history. The Boston Symphony remains an orchestra unsurpassed by any in the world in the number of first-rate players it contains. Not half a dozen bands can compare with it."

The Hartford concert will be February 3, at the Capitol Theater. The preliminary ticket sale is announced by Frank A. Sedgwick, at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch

Symphony Sale Starts

Box office sale of season tickets for the series of symphony concerts in Memorial hall, sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, began at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, Monday morning. The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the series on Nov. 1. Other concerts are: the Cincinnati orchestra, Dec. 3; the Cleveland, Feb. 4, and the Detroit, March 4. Unpaid for reservations will be held at the box office until Thursday only.

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

MUSICAL NOTES

New Pieces at Boston Symphony

Two new pieces were introduced a recent Boston Symphony concert. The novelties were suites from Stravinsky's latest ballet, "Apollo Leader of the Muses," and Zotan Kodalsky's opera, "Hary Janos." The Appolo was first performed at the chamber music festival of the Library of Congress in Washington last April, and has since been given in London and Paris as a ballet. The suite suggests the opera ballet music of the 18th and 19th centuries; but there is a reminiscence of plain song as well as of Johann Strauss, of Pergolese and Tchaikowsky, and worn, it is said in Stravinsky's own manner. The grave defect is not lack of conventionality, but lack of emotional intensity and driving power. The apotheosis at the end seems much like memorial music.

The Kodalky suite is of fragments from the opera, Hary Janos, whose tales of his prodigious adventures recall those of Munchausen, or the Paul Bunyan of the American Northwest. The music is brilliantly scored for full modern orchestra in which the pianoforte is very skillfuly used. Themes are said to be taken from Hungarian popular music before it was influenced by Gypsy music. It is tuneful, sprightly, and ought to become a permanent part of orchestral repertory.

SUN
LEWISTON, ME.
OCT 22 1928

MUSICAL NOTES

New Pieces at Boston Symphony

Two new pieces were introduced at a recent Boston Symphony concert. The novelties were suites from Stravinsky's latest ballet, "Apollo, Leader of the Muses," and Zotan Kodalsky's opera, "Hary Janos." The Appolo was first performed at the chamber music festival of the Library of Congress in Washington last April, and has since been given in London and Paris as a ballet. The suite suggests the opera ballet music of the 18th and 19th centuries; but there is a reminiscence of plain song as well as of Johann Strauss, of Pergolese and Tchaikowsky, and worn, it is said in Stravinsky's own manner. The grave defect is not lack of conventionality, but lack of emotional intensity and driving power. The apotheosis at the end seems much like memorial music.

The Kodalky suite is of fragments from the opera, Hary Janos, whose tales of his prodigious adventures recall those of Munchausen, or the Paul Bunyan of the American Northwest. The music is brilliantly scored for full modern orchestra in which the pianoforte is very skillfuly used. Themes are said to be taken from Hungarian popular music before it was influenced by Gypsy music. It is tuneful, sprightly, and ought to become a permanent part of orchestral repertory.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

* * *

Seat Sale.

The box office sale of season tickets for the Symphony Club's series of orchestra concerts in Memorial Hall opens this morning at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will open the series on Thursday, Nov. 1. Unpaid reservation will be held at the box office until Thursday.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 23 1928

He Places Boston Orchestra High

Arthur M. Abell, writing in Musical Courier, pays Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra, which he directs, his highest compliment. The Boston orchestra and Koussevitzky will open the Symphony club series of concerts at Memorial hall, Thursday, Nov. 1.

"Today we have in America many fine orchestras and four of them are organizations of the first rank—the Boston, New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and Chicago orchestras," writes Abell.

"Opinions vary as to which is the greatest, but for me (and I write from a New Yorker's viewpoint) the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitzky, leads for all-around technical perfection, tonal beauty, resonance, instrumental balance and general excellence of ensemble."

Seats for the entire series of concerts are on sale at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

Koussevitzky Gives Concert on His Bass Fiddle

By IRVING WEIL.

Probably the oddest concert that this season is likely to produce took place last night in Carnegie Hall. It was the long promised performance by Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the contrabass or, being a bit vulgar, the bull fiddle. And, to make the affair the more unusual, he had to help him, Henri Casadesus, the most expert living player on the viola d'amore, an almost obsolete relic of a bygone age.

There was a very large and what is conveniently called a distinguished audience gathered to listen to these two virtuosi, although one noticed a few empty seats here and there in the hall. About all the violinists, pianists, cellists and sundries who happen now to be in town were among those present, for there could be no heart-burnings in observing someone's else enormous skill on a contrabass and a viola d'amore. These are scarcely competitive instruments.

TOURED EUROPE.

Mr. Koussevitzky's fondness for the bass fiddle goes back to his boyhood, for he began playing it when he was fourteen; and, as everybody now knows, he used to tour the whole of Europe with his instrument before he settled down as an orchestral conductor. Abroad he is known as the successor of Dragonetti and Bottesini, the two names always associated with greatest prowess on the big viol. We suppose they were able to do all the things that can be done to a contrabass; in any case, contemporary accounts in the late eighteenth and the middle nineteenth centuries say they were. But Mr. Koussevitzky last night seemed to be gracefully and completely able to do them too.

One of them is to make the bass viol sound as much as possible like a cello, just as the cellist tries to make his instrument sound as much as possible like a violin. This is achieved with a smooth tone in the highest position, which means accomplishing the feat of bending down over the giant length of the contrabass as though the player were about to kiss it on the bridge. And when that isn't enough, there are harmonics, another of the pretty difficulties. Bowing agility, without giving the impression of capering tone, is still another.

MUSIC SCARCE.

All these things Mr. Koussevitzky managed with suavity and ease. But he could not create what does not exist; that is to say, music of either value or interest devised for the contrabass—not even by writing some of it himself. He and Mr. Casadesus dug up a symphony concertante and a sonata for viola d'amore and contrabass, the one by Lorenziti and the other by Borghi, two otherwise completely forgotten worthies of the eighteenth century, but a little of them went a long, long way. Mr. Koussevitzky also played a concerto and a "Miniature Waltz" of his own.

The concerto need not be seriously held against him, for it was a youthful offense— and sounded like it. But it did give him a chance to show what an exquisite, pure tone he can draw with his bow. There were also a few other matters, but equally of no importance as music.

Mr. Casadesus, who is the head of the Society of Ancient Instruments of Paris, came all the way over here for this concert. His art on the viola d'amore is as beautiful as the name of the instrument. And this antique must have its secret trials for the executant, for it possesses seven bowed strings and seven others that sound sympathetically when the first set give forth certain notes. The tone is thus something like that of a harpsichord without the plucked effect. A charming instrument, but it, too, is quickly bedeviled by monotony.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 24 1928

Serge Koussevitzky

The conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, has been criticized in Boston and New York for his introduction and playing of works of modern composers. He considers this music beautiful and representative and is making every effort to popularize it. The orchestra plays here Nov. 1 in Memorial Hall. The box office is at the Carl Koch Co., 102 E. Broad St.

197

MUSIC

NY. TRIBUNE By LAWRENCE GILMAN Oct 24

Koussevitzky Plays the Double Bass in Recital at Carnegie Hall

Concert by Serge Koussevitzky, double-bass; assisted by Henri Casadesus, viola d'amore; at Carnegie Hall. Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist.

PROGRAM

1. Symphonie concertante.....Lorenziti
   Viola d'amore and double-bass.
2. Concerto for double-bass.....Koussevitzky
3. Sonata No. 1.....Borghi
   Viola d'amore and double-bass.
4. Petite Suite, for viola d'amore...Lorenziti
5. Numbers for double-bass solo:
   (a) Largo from sonata.....Eccles
   (b) Minuet .....Beethoven
   (c) Berceuse .....Lasca
   (d) Valse Miniature.....Koussevitzky

SHORTLY before an audience of celebrities and a few others ceased streaming down the aisles of Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, unchaperoned by his Boston Symphony Orchestra, walked a bit nervously across the stage and took his place to windward of an accompanist's grand piano. Behind him came a white-gloved attendant, bearing rather gingerly an instrument that had never in our recollection been played in recital within those fairly ancient walls. This was no less august a vehicle of music than a double-bass—the double-bass of the greatest living virtuoso upon that gargantuan fiddle.

Mr. Koussevitzky was companioned, for his opening number (and one other), by Mr. Henri Casadesus, distinguished specialist in old instruments and old music, on this occasion presented as player of the viola d'amore, that double-stringed fiddle whose tone is as romantic as its name; for the two artists were to discourse together a sinfonia concertante by the little known Luigi Lorenziti from eighteenth century Italy.

The audience attended with lively curiosity as the gracious, courtly duo was traversed—with Mr. Koussevitzky very modestly subordinating himself to his companion. It was not until the next number, when the illustrious contre-bassiste had the stage to himself in his own concerto, that Mr. Koussevitzky's hearers really sat up.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky, as all the world knows, was an illustrious virtuoso on the double bass before he became even more eminent as a conductor of potent magnetism and vitality. When he first began to give recitals in Russia a quarter century or so ago (assisted by a singer named Chaliapin), the reviewers compared the furor that he provoked with that aroused by Adelina Patti. He toured the world as a conquering virtuoso, with his great fiddle trailing after him; dropped it professionally when orchestral conducting absorbed him, and resumed its public use a few years ago in Providence as a gesture of thanks when Brown University bestowed upon him the honorary degree of Master of Music. Last autumn he gave a double bass recital in Boston, and last week he gave another there. Last night's will surely not be his only appearance here as soloist.

* * *

If there is anything rarer in New York concert halls than a guitar recital was before Mr. Segovia's day, it must surely be a double-bass recital. The bull fiddle, that "dangerous rogue elephant," as Sir Charles Stanford called it, is familiar to most of us only as one of those stalwart beasts of burden who carry the orchestra on their backs. Contemporary American concertgoers are as little accustomed to thinking of the bull fiddle as a soloist's plaything as they are to imagining, say, an afternoon of music for the piccolo.

Double bass soloists are not wholly unknown here; and there have, of course, been famous performers upon the instrument. The eccentric Venetian, Domenico Dragonetti, "gaunt and brown and tough, like one of his own strings," as Chorley described him, amazed the world by his marvelous performances upon the double bass a century ago (he could play on his double bass the violin part of a quartet). Later there was Bottesini, who, like Mr. Koussevitzky, was also distinguished as a conductor, and, again like his Russian successor, composed music for his instrument, when he was not playing with his large and remarkable collection of dolls—for he was an "original" of the purest water. Earlier than either of the celebrated Italian virtuosi was Joseph Kämpfer, who also could play exacting violin passages on his double bass, and who particularly excelled, as Mr. Koussevitzky does, in the expert and delicately beautiful use of harmonics.

Serge Koussevitzky

Who made his first New York appearance as a double bass soloist last night at Carnegie Hall

We do not know if Dragonetti or Bottesini ever visited this country (certainly Kämpfer never did); but if so, the event has long faded out of the public memory—for Dragonetti has been dead for eighty-two years and Bottesini for almost forty. So to Mr. Koussevitzky must go the distinction of having added a new and exciting pleasure to the possible experiences of our music lovers. He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar (where Cecil Forsyth warned us not to stable him forever), and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude, or speak oracular solemnities, but who can sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of sombre richness that no cello is able to attain.

From Mr. Koussevitzky's lowest string issues a tone purged of all raucousness, noble and superb, and from thence upward the scale is pure, euphonious, beguiling—upward to the region of the flageolet tones, where Mr. Koussevitzky's harmonics have a clear, etherial and crystalline loveliness that challenges credulity.

* * *

But indeed, every aspect of Mr. Koussevitzky's dealing with the cumbrous, four-tongued, monstrous creature that tops him by a head is a challenge to the listener's credulity. When Pignolet de Monteclair introduced the double-bass into the orchestra of the Paris Opera two centuries and a quarter ago, he characterized it as one which "should be employed for tempests and storms, and for the speech of demons, magicians and lost souls." But Mr. Koussevitzky, a virtuoso doubled by a poet, can make the formidable creature sing with tenderness and intimacy and warmth. One sits enchanted, thinking of the gentler viols and of human throats. For this is a master who not only exerts with suavity and elegance the technique of the super-expert, but who phrases like a great singer, imagines like an architect, and dreams of beautiful surfaces like a designer of fine webs.

* * *

His own concerto was devised, naturally, to exploit his instrument and his art, and for that it served effectively. None of the music of the program, qua music, was of the highest virtue. But that is doubtless the prime drawback of being a consummate player of the double-bass. Equipped to sing great music upon a noble instrument, one is balked by the absence of great music to be sung.

Mr. Casadesus was a fit associate of his brother artist. Hearing them play together, one remembered what old Chorley wrote almost a century ago after listening to the fabulous Dragonetti and his artistic partner, Lindley the 'cellist: "They talked to each other on the violoncello and double-bass, bending their heads with quiet, confidential smiles. Nothing has been since heard to compare with the intimacy of their mutual musical sympathy."

A rare evening; a memorable disclosure!

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

OCT 24 1928

BASS VIOLINS REVIVE MUSIC OF OLDEN TIME

Unusual Program Offered by Boston Symphony Thrills Audience.

AIRS HOLD CROWD

Serge Koussevitzky Demonstrates Ability by Work at Carnegie Hall.

By CHARLES D. ISAACSON.

The ancient and honorable order of bass fiddles moved to the center of the musical arena last night and enjoyed the dazzling glare of the spotlight at Carnegie Hall last night.

The contra bass left its accustomed place in the back of the orchestra and took the solo position, in the arms of the conductor himself, the pride of staid Boston's honored symphony—Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the unique event of a lifetime of concert-going. The recital itself was sufficiently unusual to attract attention, but the personality of the recitalist, gave to the program, a combination of so many aspects, that it may be written into music-history as an adventure.

Only the full realization of the whole curious ensemble of backgrounds, can bring out the extraordinary thing which took place. To do that, one must remember the dignity of the Hub, the history of the orchestra, the personages assembled about the life of that noble organization.

Further one must realize the position of the Conductor, himself, his predecessors, his necessarily difficult niche. Add to that the general impression of the Bass-Violin, the grandfather of the violin; the astonishment at the very dream of using the giant, roaring deep-throated, seemingly cumbersome and heavily-speaking voice for solo work. And you have a notion of the contrasting ideas which were flying in droves in the atmosphere.

It was such a program as might have been expected to draw the elect of the art, the understanding, the elite, the initiate and the sacred inner circle. Combined with these listeners, were the admirers of the conductor, Serge Koussevitsky.

Turns Back History.

But for the lovers of the old and deeply stirring music of an ancient day, this was an esthetic treat.

In the imagination of those who listened, pages of history turned back and as Henri Casadesus with the viola d'amore, played to the double-bass of Koussevitzky and the piano of Pierre Luboshutz, we knew what our great grandparents and their grandparents had experienced. That Rondo! Dear readers, it had the spell of long-forgotten incarnate memories wrapped in it. It had something of the roughness of an old dance, and yet was sweet and fragrant and elusive.

Elusiveness was the chief quality of this program. It was realized at the opening notes of the Lorenziti Symphonic Concertante. It grew on the audience, as the moments progressed. There was a vague and haunting mystery to it all.

Well can I understand the love which Koussevitzky holds for his instrument, which he forsook to wave the baton. And well can we understand the fame which he knew as virtuoso.

Full Range of Tone.

The giant was as a violin in his hands; it whispered as well as thundered. It exceeded itself, and it did unbelievable things, yet it never went outside its province. Thank the good taste of a great artist that, with all his powers, he never once asked the instrument to do a single "trick" or perform for the crowds. He never demanded that it be other than itself. Consequently there was the realization that such a recital is really not for general consumption or frequent consumption, perhaps. The voice of the bass violin was given many colors, within its own spectrum.

The artist knew no bounds. His technique was tremendous; he played as a violinist would do. He even brought us harmoniques, which drew overtones, way above the ordinary range. We delighted in Koussevitzky's own Concerto. It was of the bass and for the bass.

Praise is due that indefatigable laborer for the redemption of ancient instruments, M. Casadesus, who came over from Paris for this concert, Pierre Luboshutz shared in the applause as well he deserved to do.

The program included further, Borghi's Third Sonata for Viola d'Amore, and double bass; and Lozensiti's "Petite Suite" for d'Amore, and a group of little numbers transposed and written for the bass violin.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 24 1928

MUSIC

By HAROLD A. STRICKLAND.

THE BULL FIDDLE'S DAY

Not only is a change being effected in musical forms in these days of novelty, jazz, speed, etc., but even our accustomed types of concerts are falling before the assaults of those who desire to offer and do offer "something different."

We have had piccolo sonatas, guitar recitals and, via radio, musical saws and fine-toothed comb concerts, but it remained for one of our hitherto staid gentlemen of music to present last night a form of concert which was entirely new and contrary to what had ever gone before.

Of course the way had been prepared. For some time have we heard and read much concerning the virtuosity of one Serge Koussevitsky, who in the days before he exchanged the garb of a traveling Russian musician for the formal evening attire demanded in the city of culture, was known as an accomplished player of the despised bull fiddle. Mr. Koussevitsky, now risen to the top of our conducting staff, is known to have suffered from pangs of remorse recently, and whenever he surveyed his orchestra and his eye caught the choir of double-bass players, conscience would prick him as though he had forgotten the friend of his youth.

So last season he decided to risk the ire of Boston and offered a recital there. Contrary to expectation, he was not forced to withdraw under a fire of satire, but found that the Bostonese liked his work as much as the Russian peasants in the days when he and one Chaliapin were engaged in gathering rubles.

Thereupon the conductor of the Boston Symphony decided to invade New York, and last night, accompanied by Henri Casadesus, maitre of the viola d'amore, he offered a bull fiddle recital. To those who believe that this instrument is capable only of emitting raucous noises and sonorous shrieks, the recital of Mr. Koussevitsky was a revelation. Never in the experience of this reviewer did the bass viol sound so much like a 'cello as it did under Mr. Koussevitsky's playing—not sawing. That there is required a technique almost as difficult as that for the most noble of the string instruments became evident as this conductor-player continued on his way, and that some beautiful tones are located within the sounding board of this elephantine member of the viol family was shown when the master hand played it.

With a limited repertoire available, it was necessary for Mr. Koussevitsky to compose works for the instrument, and that these were written primarily for the double-bass was apparent in their offering. However, the work of Mr. Casadesus must not pass unnoticed, for when he played with his more distinguished companion we had really a conversation between two gentlemen both of whose voices had matured.

Aside from the novelty of the affair, it was really notable as a musical event, for it showed plainly that genuine musicians, regardless of their media, can always speak noble language.

Mr. Thomas Returns.

It was with regret that I hied downtown to the Town Hall, where the most accomplished baritone of the country was holding forth after another season of opera abroad. John Charles Thomas was in the midst of his aria from Massenet's "Salome" when I reached the hall. Here was drama in the voice, but not an overabundance. He had opened his program with some lieder and Peri's "Invocazione di Orfeo," and then came some French and modern English ballads. At intervals Eric Zardo, who accompanied him, offered some piano numbers.

Mr. Thomas was in rare form, singing superbly, with skilful phrasing, excellent diction and with a warmth of

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

OCT 24 28

Boston Symphony Here On Monday

With no concerts scheduled for this week the next musical event will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman Theater Monday night. The change was made from the regular Friday night concert date because the touring itinerary of the famous Boston ensemble would not permit a stopover on Rochester on Friday.

Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, will be on the conductor's stand. Last season an audience that packed the theater heard Mr. Kousevitzky and his men give a magnificent performance and the program arranged for next Monday night gives assurance of a similar treat. Two of the works on the program will have a first Rochester hearing—the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and excerpts from Raval's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The concert opens Series Band the complete program follows:

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 24 28

Again the Double-Bass

Serge Koussevitzky, double-bass, assisted by Henri Casadesus, viola d'amore; Bernard Zigera, accompanist, played on the evening of October 17 a unique concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, the like of which only the chosen of time and circumstance have been fortunate enough to hear. A man of Mr. Koussevitzky's art does not appear in every generation, while the association of two such as he and the connoisseur of instruments of centuries long past is as rare as the transit of Venus.

It was no new experience for Mr. Koussevitzky, and the enthusiasm that greeted him made clear that his skill was not unknown to his audience. His appearance brought a long and continued uproar of applause, which at the conclusion of his concerto was augmented by another, when he was fairly inundated with flowers, as though he were a prima donna of the first magnitude. He balked, man-like, at the floral tribute, but finally took the bouquets with as much grace as he could command and put them on the piano.

The virtuoso had never shown better form. He handled the huge instrument with a firmness and tenderness of the iron hand in the velvet glove. His tone, all golden, was spun with an amplitude whose variety suggested nothing more inaccurate than a micrometer. It rose from the gossamer film of a silken thread and grew to the stout rotundity of a ship's hawser on a graduation that tested the accuracy of the most delicate ear.

There is no greater test for player or instrument than this—the gradual and accurate shading of a tone by beginning with the bow at the end of the fingerboard, gradually and almost imperceptibly drawing it onward and downward, the while just as gradually increasing its speed and its pressure until the hairs seem to touch the edge of the bridge at the very crest of the wave of sound. Then begins the decrescendo on a change of stroke, ending pianissimo at the point where the tone begun. This feat Koussevitzky did again and again, to the wonder and amazement of all who play on strings.

Where his marvellous left hand gets its delicacy, its unerring accuracy, and its might, is a question that has always bothered men of stronger hands which they have always found too weak. The bow is more a matter of fine nerve and synchronous adjustment; it is a matter of temperament and brain. But the fingers are concerned with quick, sudden, and clean-cut leverage, for which the prime requisite is might.

Mr. Koussevitzky's tone was always that of a strong man certain of his strength. He could descend to the lowest levels and mount to the greatest altitudes with equal ease, while in running rapid arpeggios he was as infallible as the most accomplished pianist. In his lyric chant he could start with the voice of the rude cyclops and change it to the gentlest tones of Galatea without sign or gesture. His 'cello tones were richer, broader, and more covered than those of the finest 'cello while his violin tones gave no indication of parody but were as round and clear and delicate as those of the violin itself. In his duets with the viola d'amore whether tonally above or below that instrument, his sense of proportion, emphasis, and variety was equally just.

The viola d'amore, on the other hand, justified its own passing before the dominance of the greater violin; for the viola d'amore tone is more like the voice of a woman grown old in her art—hard and stiff and nasal and glassy, whose singing days are numbered.

M. C. W.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

Konssevitzky Gives a Double Bass Recital

That rarity of rarities—a double bass recital—charmed and delighted the Carnegie Hall audience last evening, when Serge Koussevitsky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned to the instrument of his youth.

Mr. Koussevitzky, it will be remembered, was a virtuoso on the double bass long before he took over the leadership of the Boston Orchestra, and it was self-evident last night that he had returned to an early love. Boston, for a few times during the past year, has heard Mr. Koussevitzky in double bass recitals, but it was New York' first opportunity. In the early part of the program Henri Casadesus assisted.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
OCT 24 1928

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

ONLY four men in history have been celebrated as virtuosi of the contrabass, popularly known as the "doghouse," and one gave a recital with that cumbrous instrument last night at Carnegie Hall. He was Serge Koussevitzky, redoubtable director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As assistants appeared Henri Casadesus, performer on the viole d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist.

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first solo concert in New York and his second in America, his introductory recital having occurred last season in Boston. There was a large, curious and affable gathering, to most if not all of whom the program offered, as it did to the writer, a totally new experience.

Between the pianoforte and the footlights an attendant placed a chair which, as it proved, was not intended for Mr. Casadesus but for the bass viol, which reclined upon it during intermissions with a half-human and jauntily august repose. Another servitor, wearing the embarrassed air of a footman, burdened with a gargantuan infant larger than himself, staggered in with the instrument.

* * *

Those of us unfamiliar with the bass fiddle save through the projection of a tier of necks at the rear of orchestras, seized the opportunity for a closer examination. It was a handsome and glistening creation, bearing in every line the mark of race. According to advance information, it was the handiwork of Gironimo Amati of Cremona

In that case, the instrument had apparently been remodeled, for it was of the four-string species which did not come into use until the beginning of the nineteenth century. In the flat back and sloping shoulders, it preserved features of the primitive viol, but the f-holes and arched belly were those of the violin clan. This was a full-size orchestral bass, instead of the smaller basso di camera, with three strings, employed by Dragonetti and Bottesini; and its accordiatura was presumably that of the standard symphonic instrument—E, A, D, G.

The performer himself, quickly following his instrument, was applauded for some minutes. When he grasped the contrabass, with his left arm about its shoulders, the neck towered far above his head. He employed the usual squat and heavy bow, held not in violoncello position, but with the palm grasping its butt. That the physical labor of manipulating the varnished colossus was no sinecure appeared from the industry with which, during interludes, Mr. Koussevitzky mopped a dripping brow.

* * *

Instantly markworthy was the strength and spread of the left hand. Since the vibrating string-length of the doublebass is twice that of the violoncello, the distance between adjacent semitones on the two instruments is in the proportion of 2 to 1. When the hand is closest to the nut, the maximum stretch between the first and fourth fingers compasses only a whole tone. In order to negotiate these spaces, Mr. Koussevitzky's hand had developed such prodigious elasticity that it seemed to envelop the great fingerboard like the jaws of an anaconda.

As for the energy of the member, more than once, unless my eyes were deceived, he fretted the ponderous E string with the little finger, and the pressure required must have been many pounds. Besides employing the four fingers, the performer seemed habitually to use the thumb, which is utilized only occasionally with the violoncello. The bow was flourished with a delicacy and speed belying its club-like bluntness.

* * *

Sir Charles Stanford once exclaimed against the contrabass as "a dangerous rogue-elephant," but Mr. Koussevitzky's pachyderm was a model of gentleness and placidity. The tone was unexpectedly mild-mannered; instead of the bad-tempered twang of the smaller violoncello we heard an equable drone, a nasal buzz of genial majesty. The old three-stringer, one is told, was far more sonorous, obstinate and irascible.

As the violoncello has steadily approached the violin's fleetness, so Mr. Koussevitzky's giant instrument encroached in turn upon the violoncello's technique. He used the G-string as a chanterelle, and, moving often in the highest region of the fingerboard, sent fractional notes scampering at a dizzy pace. Melodies were made to sing with smoothest cantabile and legato, much elegance of phraseology and no small approximation to expressiveness.

* * *

The opening number was listed as a Symphonie Concertante for viole d'amore and double bass, with piano by A. Lorenziti, a worthy of the eighteenth century, so obscure that his name does not appear in the dictionaries of Grove or Baker. The work bore every mark of having been composed for violin and violoncello. Certainly the bass viol sojourned wholly, so far as I could discover, inside the violoncello's range.

Tempering the force of his bow to the fragility of the viole d'amore, an instrument designed for a small chamber rather than Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky produced a tone resembling a warm caramel. The combination of a piano with these two instruments, rather than a harpsichord, was acoustically to be reprehended.

A work sincerely in the idiom of the base viol was Mr. Koussevitsky's own Concerto for Doublebass, composed in 1902. Here for the first time was brought into play that abysmal scale from low C down to E by which the bass fiddle surpasses the violoncello in depth. Here also was displayed the larger instrument's extreme facility in gamboling with harmonics—a feat in which the performer was not always successfully accurate. As to the musical value of the work, it may be remarked that the sentimental theme of the slow movement possesses no slight resemblance to the melody of "Mighty Lak a Rose."

* * *

The next offering, entitled "Third Sonata for Viole d'Amore and Double Bass," also bore many stigmata of a transcription from violin and violoncello. The composer was Luigi Borghi, a violinist of the later eighteenth century. Mr. Casadesus followed with a Petite Suite, ascribed to the aforesaid A. Lorenziti. The viole d'amore, with its seven sympathetic strings, uttering a tinkling and toy-like murmur in response to the seven bowed strings, was admirably played, but in itself inspired mostly an antiquarian interest.

The program ended with a group of frank transcriptions for the contrabass—the largo from Henry Eccles's 'cello sonata in G Minor, Beethoven's Minuet, G. Laska's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's Valse Miniature.

* * *

While this revelation of the bass fiddle as a solo instrument was an engaging tour de force, and reflected high credit upon Mr. Koussevitzky as an artist and executant, the final impression left was that musicians have shown a sound instinct in reserving the contrabass for its great function as the basis of the orchestra. A second recital would no doubt prove endurable, and a third probably a bore.

It is perhaps significant that Mr. Koussevitzky and Bottesini owed their choice of this instrument to accident. Both were too poor to pay their own tuition at a conservatory, and both discovered that the only scholarships untenanted were those for the double bass.

The other three celebrities of the "doghouse" were Domenico Dragonetti (1763-1846), intimate of Haydn and friend of Beethoven, who was compelled to go in hiding when Napoleon occupied Vienna because the Emperor wished to carry him off by force to Paris; Giovanni Bottesini (1822-1889), who invented the bow used by Mr. Koussevitzky, and August Mueller (1819-1867), a German master.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT

CONCERTS OPEN OCT. 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Start Foundation Series Here.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open the Buffalo Musical Foundation series of concerts at Elmwood Music hall Oct. 30 and will be followed at short intervals throughout the season by the Hollander, Mengelberg, Metod Dolezil, the Bohemian conductor, coming with the Prague chorus; Sir Thomas Beecham, the British orchestra conductor; Nikolai Sokoloff, the Russian of American training and education; and Victor Kolar, also a Bohemian.

The programs will thus bring to Buffalo music of all the principal countries where symphony music abounds. Mr. Koussevitzky is especially interested in the new music and will include some on his program. Mr. Mengelberg leans toward the so-called classic composers; the Prague choir will present the Czecho-Slovakian composers for American consideration; while Mr. Sokoloff keeps a classic composer as the backbone of his programs, but is interested in young Americans and their work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
OCT 24

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky in Double Bass Recital Converts Bulky Instrument Into Expressive Medium for Beauty

THE DOUBLE BASS is not a solo instrument. So eminent an authority as Grove's Dictionary establishes that. The amazing performances of Domenico Dragonetti and Giovanni Bottesini in the last century were merely the exceptions that prove the rule. Besides, Bottesini used the basso di camera, which is not the full-sized orchestral double bass. Therefore, when Serge Koussevitzky came to Carnegie Hall last night in the role of recital contrabassist, possessed of an instrument that yielded nothing in bulk to those that provide an undertone for his Boston Symphony,, he was predestined to clinch the case for the writer in Grove. He did so, by providing another exception after the fashion of Dragonetti and Bottesini. One was reminded of what Spontini said to Wagner; he had done better than he could do. Without a solo instrument, the Boston conductor supplied the most astonishing solo playing. His double-bass was not for such purposes; it merely achieved them like the violin of Fritz Kreisler or the 'cello of Pablo Casals.

A notable audience awaited this first revelation in New York of the art which occupied Mr. Koussevitzky almost exclusively in Europe for some thirteen years, when he was feted and acclaimed as a virtuoso of the concert platform. If it had expected him to carry in his own double bass, it was disappointed. His bow might have been his baton, as he emerged amid plaudits, followed by one in white gloves whose part of the program it was to get the goliath of fiddles on and off the stage. Also, if the curious looked to him to occupy the chair that stood significantly in the center of the platform, they were disappointed again. Even virtuoso contrabassists liberate the most ecstatic of their reveries standing up. The chair was there for the pampered instrument to lean against when its lord and master communicated with whomsoever he communicated with between his groups, behind the scenes.

OF DRAGONETTI it is related that he found his priceless Di Salo in the convent of St. Pietro, and that he tested its powers on the monks of San Giustina by imitating a thunderstorm and bringing them out of their cells at night. There were no thunderstorms in Carnegie last night, though it rained outside. The Koussevitzky double bass neither rumbled nor growled. But it sang a berceuse by G. Laska like the fondest and gentlest of mothers, and it not only stepped lightly in the Beethoven minuet in G (fiddler's choice) but flung up its heels in a gigue by Luigi Borghi.

For the most part, it was playing to suggest a somewhat under-resonant cello, sweet and velvety of tone, freer than most cellos of surface buzz, tender and a little remote—with something even wraithlike in its grace of phrase. Saint-Saens may have been joking the jokester when he gave the "Dance of the Sylphes" to the double basses in his elephantine parody of Berlioz in the "Carnival of the Animals." Cheek by jowl, Mr. Koussevitzky and his gargantuan viol produced rapid passages that were clean and crisp, and harmonics that were essentially musical if not so disembodied as those of the violin.

That everything the contrabassist played possessed the style and finesse of a very superior artist was not so surprising as these technical feats. Manhattan has not known Koussevitzky the conductor without acquiring knowledge of his status as a musician. Incidentally, it may be recalled that Bottesini, too, achieved success as a conductor. Both he and Dragonetti were composers, Bottesini not chiefly for his instrument.

NOT to be less versatile than his artistic antecessors, Mr. Koussevitzky proffered his own concerto for double bass, composed in 1902, seven years before he realized his dream to conduct an orchestra of his own. The concerto served its purpose agreeably, and, if not great music, or music without indebtedness to men who wrote more momentously, it is conceivable that Fritz Kreisler may yet transcribe its andante for the violin!

A generous part of the program was shared with Henri Casadesus, player of the viola d'amore and leading spirit of the Paris Society of Ancient Instruments. He played with Koussevitzky in Lorenziti's Symphonie Concertante and Borghi's Third Sonata, innocent enough examples of eighteenth century string writing, and had his individual success with a suite by the former of the two composers. Pierre Luboschutz played admirable accompaniments, though it appeared not always easy for him to subdue the piano to the small dimensions of the double bass tone. In using the four strings of the ordinary orchestral instrument Mr. Koussevitzky sacrificed something of brilliance, it being the common experience of contrabassists that the three-string instrument used by Bottesini yields a fuller resonance.

To remark that there were much enthusiasm and prodigious applause last night is only to append the inevitable.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Boston Symphony Brings New Music; Flonzaley's Last Visit

Serge Koussevitski to Conduct Great Orchestra in Opening of Series B Concerts at Eastman; Two Works to Have First Hearing Here

Concert Calendar

TOMORROW

Baptist Temple—The Hall Johnson Negro Choir of New York in a program of spirituals, folk and work songs, 8:20 p. m.

MONDAY, OCT. 29

Eastman Theater—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting. First concert in Eastman Theater's Series B, 8:20 p. m.

THURSDAY, NOV. 1

Kilbourn Hall—The Flonzaley String Quartet. Second concert the Kilbourn Hall Monday series. Farewell appearance in Rochester of the Flonzaley Quartet.

The Hall Johnson Negro Choir is composed of singers gathered by its leader from the southern states. At its first appearance in New York last Spring the choir achieved marked success. It sang at the stadium concerts in New York last Summer and by request made a second appearance at those concerts. It sings here in Rochester under the management of the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, to the interest of which the proceeds of the concert will be devoted.

Boston Symphony

There will be no Eastman Theater concerts this week, the motion picture, "Wings," holding the screen through Friday night. The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard next Monday evening, with Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, on the conductor's stand.

The Boston Symphony opens Series B concerts, and the event takes place on Monday instead of the regular Friday concert night because of the orchestra's touring itinerary. Two years ago an audience that packed the theater heard the Boston Symphony and a program that is fully as attractive has been arranged by Mr. Koussevitzky for the forthcoming visit. Two of the works will have a first Rochester hearing—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The complete program follows:

"Clasical" Symphony, Op. 25..... Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite)

"Lever du Jour"—Pantomime—"Danse Generale" .....Ravel

(Promenade Intermission.)

Symphony No. 3 in D Major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms

Flonzaley Quartet

For 24 years the Flonzaley Quartet has been playing publicly in this country and in Europe. It has played many times in Rochester. Music lovers of the city have memories of its superb performances. On Thursday night, Nov. 1, the quartet will play here for the last time. The quartet is to disband. Certainly the future would add little to its reputation; this is and has been for years the highest. There are many other string quartets now active in this country. Twenty-four years ago the Flonzaleys and the Kneisels alone did yeoman work for string quartet music and performance of the best. For a time the Flonzaleys carried on alone. They came to see every season entirely filled with engagements long before it opened. They became the greatest introducer of new music to the American public that has ever been before that public, and one of the greatest performing ensembles of the classics. The Flonzaley Quartet has a record to justify pride and full satisfaction. Tickets for its concert on Nov. 1 are for sale at the Kilbourn Hall box office.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 24 1928

ORCHESTRA TO BE HEARD MONDAY

With no concerts scheduled for this week the next musical event will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman Monday night. The change was made from the regular Friday concert date because the itinerary of the famous Boston ensemble would not permit a stopover in Rochester on Friday.

Rather than deny the music lovers of the community opportunity to hear this great orchestra, the Eastman concert management decided to switch the concert date to Monday, which fits in with the schedule of the Bostonians.

Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished Russian leader, will be at the conductor's stand. Last season an audience that packed the theater heard Mr. Koussevitsky and his men give a magificant performance, and the program arranged for Monday night gives assurance of a similar treat.

The concert opens Series B. The complete program follows:

Classical Symphony, Opus 25 ..... Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

Prelude a l'Apres-mide d'un Faune (The Afternoon Debussy of a Foun)

Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Orchestral Excepts from "Daphnis et Chloe" .....Ravel (Second Suite)

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 3 in D major, Opus 73 ..... Brahms
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirto

Seats are now available for the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

handling of the unwieldy fiddle that, trusting to the sound of the instrument in the middle and upper registars, one could have sworn that he was playing on a cello. Watching Mr. Koussevitzky's fingers scampering with incredible rapidity over the strings even strengthened this illusion. In rapid passages, in scales and appeggios, in double stopping, in the whole bag of virtuoso tricks which one had always associated with violinists and cellists, the versatile conductor proved himself no whit behind a Heifetz or a Casals.

With the excellent assistance of Henri Casadesus, who plays the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, who supplied the piano accompaniments, Mr. Koussevitzky offered a "symphonie concertante," by A. Lorenziti, an obscure composer of the eighteenth century, and a sonata by L. Borghi, also of that period, while his solos included a concerto by himself, composed in 1902, and some small pieces by H. Eccles, Beethoven and others.

A large number of Mr. Koussevitzky's local admirers turned out to see whether the esteemed conductor could do as much with a double-bass as with the Boston orchestra, and finding that he could, they raised the roof of Carnegie Hall with vociferous hand-clapping.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
OCT 24 1925

MUSIC

By Richard L. Stokes

ONLY four men in history have been celebrated as virtuosi of the contrabass, popularly known as the "doghouse," and one gave a recital with that cumbrous instrument last night at Carnegie Hall. He was Serge Koussevitzky, redoubtable director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As assistants appeared Henri Casadesus, performer on the viole d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist.

This was Mr. Koussevitzky's first solo concert in New York and his second in America, his introductory recital having occurred last season in Boston. There was a large, curious and affable gathering, to most if not all of whom the program offered, as it did to the writer, a totally new experience.

Between the pianoforte and the footlights an attendant placed a chair which, as it proved, was not intended for Mr. Casadesus but for the bass viol, which reclined upon it during intermissions with a half-human and jauntily august repose. Another servitor, wearing the embarrassed air of a footman, burdened with a gargantuan infant larger than himself, staggered in with the instrument.

* * *

Those of us unfamiliar with the bass fiddle save through the projection of a tier of necks at the rear of orchestras, seized the opportunity for a closer examination. It was a handsome and glistening creation, bearing in every line the mark of race. According to advance information, it was the handiwork of Gironimo Amati of Cremona

In that case, the instrument had apparently been remodeled, for it was of the four-string species which did not come into use until the beginning of the nineteenth century. In the flat back and sloping shoulders, it preserved features of the primitive viol, but the f-holes and arched belly were those of the violin clan. This was a full-size orchestral bass, instead of the smaller basso di camera, with three strings, employed by Dragonetti and Bottesini; and its accordiatura was presumably that of the standard symphonic instrument—E, A, D, G.

The performer himself, quickly following his instrument, was applauded for some minutes. When he grasped the contrabass, with his left arm about its shoulders, the neck towered far above his head. He employed the usual squat and heavy bow, held not in violoncello position, but with the palm grasping its butt. That the physical labor of manipulating the varnished colossus was no sinecure appeared from the industry with which, during interludes, Mr. Koussevitzky mopped a dripping brow.

* * *

Instantly markworthy was the strength and spread of the left hand. Since the vibrating string-length of the doublebass is twice that of the violoncello, the distance between adjacent semitones on the two instruments is in the proportion of 2 to 1. When the hand is closest to the nut, the maximum stretch between the first and fourth fingers compasses only a whole tone. In order to negotiate these spaces, Mr. Koussevitzky's hand had developed such prodigious elasticity that it seemed to envelop the great fingerboard like the jaws of an anaconda.

As for the energy of the member, more than once, unless my eyes were deceived, he fretted the ponderous E string with the little finger, and the pressure required must have been many pounds. Besides employing the four fingers, the performer seemed habitually to use the thumb, which is utilized only occasionally with the violoncello. The bow was flourished with a delicacy and speed belying its club-like bluntness.

* * *

Sir Charles Stanford once exclaimed against the contrabass as "a dangerous rogue-elephant," but Mr. Koussevitzky's pachyderm was a model of gentleness and placidity. The tone was unexpectedly mild-mannered, instead of the bad-tempered twang of the smaller violoncello we heard an equable drone, a nasal buzz of genial majesty. The old three-stringer, one is told, was far more sonorous, obstinate and irascible.

As the violoncello has steadily approached the violin's fleetness, so Mr. Koussevitzky's giant instrument encroached in turn upon the violoncello's technique. He used the G-string as a chanterelle, and, moving often in the highest region of the fingerboard, sent fractional notes scampering at a dizzy pace. Melodies were made to sing with smoothest cantabile and legato, much elegance of phraseology and no small approximation to expressiveness.

* * *

The opening number was listed as a Symphonie Concertante for viola d'amore and double bass, with piano by A. Lorenziti, a worthy of the eighteenth century, so obscure that his name does not appear in the dictionaries of Grove or Baker. The work bore every mark of having been composed for violin and violoncello. Certainly the bass viol sojourned wholly, so far as I could discover, inside the violoncello's range.

Tampering the force of his bow to the fragility of the viole d'amore, an instrument designed for a small chamber rather than Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky produced a tone resembling a warm caramel. The combination of a piano with these two instruments, rather than a harpsichord, was acoustically to be reprehended.

A work sincerely in the idiom of the base viol was Mr. Koussevitsky's own Concerto for Doublebass, composed in 1902. Here for the first time was brought into play that abysmal scale from low C down to E by which the bass fiddle surpasses the violoncello in depth. Here also was displayed the larger instrument's extreme facility in gamboling with harmonics—a feat in which the performer was not always successfully accurate. As to the musical value of the work, it may be remarked that the sentimental theme of the slow movement possesses no slight resemblance to the melody of "Mighty Lak a Rose."

* * *

The next offering, entitled "Third Sonata for Viole d'Amore and Double Bass," also bore many stigmata of a transcription from violin and violoncello. The composer was Luigi Borghi, a violinist of the later eighteenth century. Mr. Casadesus followed with a Petite Suite, ascribed to the aforesaid A. Lorenziti. The viole d'amore, with its seven sympathetic strings, uttering a tinkling and toy-like murmur in response to the seven bowed strings, was admirably played, but in itself inspired mostly an antiquarian interest.

The program ended with a group of frank transcriptions for the contrabass—the largo from Henry Eccles's 'cello sonata in G Minor, Beethoven's Minuet, G. Laska's Berceuse and Koussevitzky's Valse Miniature.

* * *

While this revelation of the bass fiddle as a solo instrument was an engaging tour de force, and reflected high credit upon Mr. Koussevitzky as an artist and executant, the final impression left was that musicians have shown a sound instinct in reserving the contrabass for its great function as the basis of the orchestra. A second recital would no doubt prove endurable, and a third probably a bore.

It is perhaps significant that Mr. Koussevitzky and Bottesini owed their choice of this instrument to accident. Both were too poor to pay their own tuition at a conservatory, and both discovered that the only scholarships untenanted were those for the double bass.

The other three celebrities of the "doghouse" were Domenico Dragonetti (1763-1846), intimate of Haydn and friend of Beethoven, who was compelled to go in hiding when Napoleon occupied Vienna because the Emperor wished to carry him off by force to Paris; Giovanni Bottesini (1822-1889), who invented the bow used by Mr. Koussevitzky, and August Mueller (1819-1867), a German master.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT

CONCERTS OPEN OCT. 30

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Start Foundation Series Here.

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open the Buffalo Musical Foundation series of concerts at Elmwood Music hall Oct. 30 and will be followed at short intervals throughout the season by the Hollander, Mengelberg, Metod Dolezil, the Bohemian conductor, coming with the Prague chorus; Sir Thomas Beecham, the British orchestra conductor; Nikolai Sokoloff, the Russian of American training and education; and Victor Kolar, also a Bohemian.

The programs will thus bring to Buffalo music of all the principal countries where symphony music abounds. Mr. Koussevitzky is especially interested in the new music and will include some on his program. Mr. Mengelberg leans toward the so-called classic composers; the Prague choir will present the Czecho-Slovakian composers for American consideration; while Mr. Sokoloff keeps a classic composer as the backbone of his programs, but is interested in young Americans and their work.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
POST
OCT 24 1925

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Koussevitzky in Double Bass Recital Converts Bulky Instrument Into Expressive Medium for Beauty

THE DOUBLE BASS is not a solo instrument. So eminent an authority as Grove's Dictionary establishes that. The amazing performances of Domenico Dragonetti and Giovanni Bottesini in the last century were merely the exceptions that prove the rule. Besides, Bottesini used the basso di camera, which is not the full-sized orchestral double bass. Therefore, when Serge Koussevitzky came to Carnegie Hall last night in the role of recital contrabassist, possessed of an instrument that yielded nothing in bulk to those that provide an undertone for his Boston Symphony,, he was predestined to clinch the case for the writer in Grove. He did so, by providing another exception after the fashion of Dragonetti and Bottesini. One was reminded of what Spontini said to Wagner; he had done better than he could do. Without a solo instrument, the Boston conductor supplied the most astonishing solo playing. His double-bass was not for such purposes; it merely achieved them like the violin of Fritz Kreisler or the cello of Pablo Casals.

A notable audience awaited this first revelation in New York of the art which occupied Mr. Koussevitzky almost exclusively in Europe for some thirteen years, when he was feted and acclaimed as a virtuoso of the concert platform. If it had expected him to carry in his own double bass, it was disappointed. His bow might have been his baton, as he emerged amid plaudits, followed by one in white gloves whose part of the program it was to get the goliath of fiddles on and off the stage. Also, if the curious looked to him to occupy the chair that stood significantly in the center of the platform, they were disappointed again. Even virtuoso contrabassists liberate the most ecstatic of their reveries standing up. The chair was there for the pampered instrument to lean against when its lord and master communicated with whomsoever he communicated with between his groups, behind the scenes.

OF DRAGONETTI it is related that he found his priceless Di Salo in the convent of St. Pietro, and that he tested its powers on the monks of San Giustina by imitating a thunderstorm and bringing them out of their cells at night. There were no thunderstorms in Carnegie last night, though it rained outside. The Koussevitzky double bass neither rumbled nor growled. But it sang a berceuse by G. Laska like the fondest and gentlest of mothers, and it not only stepped lightly in the Beethoven minuet in G (fiddler's choice) but flung up its heels in a gigue by Luigi Borghi.

For the most part, it was playing to suggest a somewhat under-resonant cello, sweet and velvety of tone, freer than most cellos of surface buzz, tender and a little remote—with something even wraithlike in its grace of phrase. Saint-Saens may have been joking the jokester when he gave the "Dance of the Sylphes" to the double basses in his elephantine parody of Berlioz in the "Carnival of the Animals." Cheek by jowl, Mr. Koussevitzky and his gargantuan viol produced rapid passages that were clean and crisp, and harmonics that were essentially musical if not so disembodied as those of the violin.

That everything the contrabassist played possessed the style and finesse of a very superior artist was not so surprising as these technical feats. Manhattan has not known Koussevitzky the conductor without acquiring knowledge of his status as a musician. Incidentally, it may be recalled that Bottesini, too, achieved success as a conductor. Both he and Dragonetti were composers, Bottesini not chiefly for his instrument.

NOT to be less versatile than his artistic antecessors, Mr. Koussevitzky proffered his own concerto for double bass, composed in 1902, seven years before he realized his dream to conduct an orchestra of his own. The concerto served its purpose agreeably, and, if not great music, or music without indebtedness to men who wrote more momentously, it is conceivable that Fritz Kreisler may yet transcribe its andante for the violin!

A generous part of the program was shared with Henri Casadesus, player of the viola d'amore and leading spirit of the Paris Society of Ancient Instruments. He played with Koussevitzky in Lorenziti's Symphonie Concertante and Borghi's Third Sonata, innocent enough examples of eighteenth century string writing, and had his individual success with a suite by the former of the two composers. Pierre Luboschutz played admirable accompaniments, though it appeared not always easy for him to subdue the piano to the small dimensions of the double bass tone. In using the four strings of the ordinary orchestral instrument Mr. Koussevitzky sacrificed something of brilliance, it being the common experience of contrabassists that the three-string instrument used by Bottesini yields a fuller resonance.

To remark that there were much enthusiasm and prodigious applause last night is only to append the inevitable.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Bos… between Taft and Roosevelt. T… same is true of New Jers… Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rh… Island and Delaware. All th… states are industrial. The pr… perity and protection issues we… heavily with them. The comn… judgment is that in these states… the present campaign, prosper… and protection compose the is… more to the front than any ot… This issue is the basis of the … diction that most of these st… will go Republican.

Serg…

Wet Sentiment

All these states have a large … sentiment, though not so great … is often supposed. It is fair ju… ment to say that Massachusetts … the whole is dry. The wetness … these states, and therefore … probability that Smith could c… them on this issue, was the p… cipal political reason for Sm… nomination. Nevertheless Sm… has allowed all but the last … weeks of the campaign go by w… out making any wet speeches … plea in these states. Smith's … barrassment lies in the diffic… of making a wet speech in t… states without endangering him … in the South, the border and … West. Meantime in the wet … ern centers, many of the wets … come to think of Smith's wet … gram as not very practicable, … to think of prosperity and stat… as paramount.

With respect to the bearing … Smith's present drive on the … tion as a whole, it is imper… for Smith to carry practically … these states. His chance of …

Baptis… son … a pr… work…

Eastma… Symp… sevits… in E… 8:20 …

Kilbour… String… the … ries. … Roch… tet.

The H… compos… leader … its first … last S… marked… stadium…

Summer and by request made a second appearance at those concerts. It sings here in Rochester under the management of the Mount Olivet Baptist Church, to the interest of which the proceeds of the concert will be devoted.

Boston Symphony

There will be no Eastman Theater concerts this week, the motion picture, "Wings," holding the screen through Friday night. The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard next Monday evening, with Serge Koussevitzky, the distinguished Russian leader, on the conductor's stand.

The Boston Symphony opens Series B concerts, and the event takes place on Monday instead of the regular Friday concert night because of the orchestra's touring itinerary. Two years ago an audience that packed the theater heard the Boston Symphony and a program that is fully as attractive has been arranged by Mr. Koussevitzky for the forthcoming visit. Two of the works will have a first Rochester hearing—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The complete program follows:

"Clasical" Symphony, Op. 25 ..... Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

"Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite)

"Lever du Jour"—Pantomime—"Danse Generale" ..... Ravel

(Promenade Intermission.)

Symphony No. 3 in D Major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms

Flonzaley Quartet

For 24 years the Flonzaley Quartet has been playing publicly in this

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 24 1925

ORCHESTRA TO BE HEARD MONDAY

With no concerts scheduled for this week the next musical event will be the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Eastman Monday night. The change was made from the regular Friday concert date because the itinerary of the famous Boston ensemble would not permit a stopover in Rochester on Friday.

Rather than deny the music lovers of the community opportunity to hear this great orchestra, the Eastman concert management decided to switch the concert date to Monday, which fits in with the schedule of the Bostonians.

Serge Koussevitsky, distinguished Russian leader, will be at the conductor's stand. Last season an audience that packed the theater heard Mr. Koussevitsky and his men give a magificant performance, and the program arranged for Monday night gives assurance of a similar treat.

The concert opens Series B. The complete program follows:

Classical Symphony, Opus 25 ..... Prokofieff
- Allegro
- Larghetto
- Gavotte
- Finale

Prelude a l'Apres-mide d'un Faune (The Afternoon Debussy of a Foun)

Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Orchestral Excepts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ..... Ravel (Second Suite)

INTERMISSION

Symphony No. 3 in D major, Opus 73 ..... Brahms
- Allegro non troppo
- Adagio non troppo
- Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
- Allegro con spirto

Seats are now available for the concert.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The Double-Bass Comes Into Its Own

Mr. Serge Koussevitzky, the celebrated conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital on the double-bass at Carnegie Hall last night.

The occurrence seems to me to come within Mr. Dana's definition of what is news. Had Mr. Koussevitzky given a recital on the piano or on the violin, even on the cello, it wouldn't have been news, for most conductors have been virtuosi on one or another of these instruments. But an orchestra leader who plays the lowly and cumbersome double-bass is a phenomenon extraordinary enough to catch the interest of almost any one.

The double-bass is an instrument which one knows to be difficult, and hopes that it were impossible. Although it is conceded to be the backbone of the orchestra, the idea of it as a solo vehicle is generally as unthinkable as the use of the tympani for the same purpose. It is known that Beethoven was fascinated by the playing of the double-bass player Dragonetti, whose skill inspired the great symphonist to write the difficult passage for the basses in the scherzo of the Fifth Symphony. But it has always been my sneaking belief that it takes all the bass players in an orchestra to negotiate the passage creditably

Last night Mr. Koussevitzky proved conclusively that the double-bass is a solo instrument—at least it is in his hands. So amazingly deft was his handling of the unwieldy fiddle that, trusting to the sound of the instrument in the middle and upper registars, one could have sworn that he was playing on a cello. Watching Mr. Koussevitzky's fingers scampering with incredible rapidity over the strings even strengthened this illusion. In rapid passages, in scales and appeggios, in double stopping, in the whole bag of virtuoso tricks which one had always associated with violinists and cellists, the versatile conductor proved himself no whit behind a Heifetz or a Casals.

With the excellent assistance of Henri Casadesus, who plays the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, who supplied the piano accompaniments, Mr. Koussevitzky offered a "symphonie concertante," by A. Lorenziti, an obscure composer of the eighteenth century, and a sonata by L. Borghi, also of that period, while his solos included a concerto by himself, composed in 1902, and some small pieces by H. Eccles, Beethoven and others.

A large number of Mr. Koussevitzky's local admirers turned out to see whether the esteemed conductor could do as much with a double-bass as with the Boston orchestra, and finding that he could, they raised the roof of Carnegie Hall with vociferous hand-clapping.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

199

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The English Singers Visit Brooklyn at the Behest of the Institute—A Double-Bass Virtuoso.

BEFORE an audience alternately deeply interested and amused, the English Singers gave last evening their first Academy of Music concert this season. Disposed about their table, part-books in hand, they presented a familiar spectacle, and the program, too, that they gave was familiar, though only in its character a survey of Elizabethan music. The madrigals, ballets, folk songs and duets that it comprised were those selected during the past summer to increase the repertory of the Singers and to add to the interest of novelty to their concerts in America.

It would be superfluous to praise lengthily the work, individual and collective, of the Singers. The excellent quality of the vocal material devoted in the interests of this ensemble is widely known and admired, and the virtuosity disclosed in its performance of excessively difficult a capella music has many times been enthusiastically, though never extravagantly, represented to the public. Nor is it necessary to stress the uniqueness of the English Singers, to whom we are indebted for the restoration of a musical treasure long enjoyed only by the student and the historian of the greatest of the arts. Since the English Singers made their first appearance in New York, a number of similar groups have been organized, and there has been a marked revival in the interest in English music of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries. For these services, if not for the entertainment afforded by their performances, we should be obliged to be grateful.

According to his custom, Mr. Kelly interspersed the program with remarks and digressions on the numbers sung, explaining the origin as well as the characteristics of the various musical forms represented in the selections. The composers of the evening included Weelkes, Bateson, Ward, Morley, Dowland Bartlet, Jones and Bennet. Two Shakesperean settings by Henry Purcess and John of Fornsete's "Sumer Is Icumen In" appeared on the latter half of the program, and here also room was found for several duets.

* * *

Unfortunately, we were unable to enjoy the full program offered by the Singers, for, while they appeared at the Academy of Music, a recital of unique interest, if of negligible importance, was taking place at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussewitsky, the majesterial conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presenting himself to New York as a double-bass virtuoso, a role in which he was once continentally known and admired.

It would be difficult, and it is unnecessary, to determine the amount of skill with which Mr. Koussewitsky played Borghi, Eccles, Beethoven and Lasca on the least favored and most utilitarian of the stringed instruments. Mr. Koussewitsky is probably the only or at least one of the very few musicians alive who publicly profess double-bass virtuosity. His recital was without parallel in our memory, or in available records of the musical activities of this city, and for this reason, as well as out of compliment to the distinguished rank of the soloist, called for recognition.

Mr. Koussewitsky was assisted by Henri Casadesus, who played the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist. His program included, in addition to music by the composers whom we have already named, a Concerto of his own composition. This, unfortunately, we did not arrive in time to hear. Perhaps some one of these days Mr. Koussewitsky may be prevailed upon to perform it with the Boston Orchestra, resigning his baton for the occasion into the hands of Mr. Burgin, the concert-master.

OTHER MUSIC.

A single impression stands out from among the many made upon the writer by John Charles Thomas' recital in the Town Hall last evening: the impression that slowly but surely Mr. Thomas is learning how to sing. The extraordinary beauty of his voice, which no one has thought to question, has in the past shown to poor advantage owing to Mr. Thomas' lack of skill and taste in its management. He was apparently content with the favor of an undiscriminating and easily satisfied public, caring little for the opinion of those who deplored his carelessness of musical effect. Last evening Mr. Thomas sang intelligently, considerate of the poetic and emotional values of the better songs on his program. Should he persevere with humanity in this direction, he should soon find himself among the two or three foremost singers of the day.

R. Z.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 2

* * *

Boston Director

Olin Downes of The New York Times ranks Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as one of the three

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondracki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other numbers on the program are Prokofieff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and esteemed friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov. 9 and 10.

Jean Bedetti, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Felix Fox, pianist, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor and pianist, will give a concert tonight in Jordan hall. The program is one of unusual interest. C. P. Bach's Concerto No. 3, A major, accompanied by strings, will be performed for the first time in Boston. The sonata for violoncello and piano by Alfano, whose opera "The Resurrection" was performed here by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, will also be heard for the first time in this city. Other compositions are Kodaly's Sonata for the violoncello alone; a Chant Elegiaque by Gaston Elcus, a valued violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and pieces by Granados and Popper. In Kodaly's Sonata, which will be played here for the second time, the G and C strings are lowered a half tone.

SUN
Oct 24

Serge Koussevitzky in Recital

Boston Symphony Conductor Pleases Vast Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital last night in Carnegie Hall, playing superbly on a double bass, and a great audience went into raptures over the achievements of a man who became a virtuoso on the ponderous fiddle in spite of himself.

For Mr. Koussevitzky went to a conservatory to study something quite different, but as he was too poor to pay he was glad to accept a scholarship. The only one open was for the double bass. He became a double bass player, and learned to love it. There are writers who declare that he is one of the three great masters the instrument has had, the other two being Dragonetti and Bottesini.

The double bass was at one time said to have been invented by Gaspar di Salo, the famous violin maker, in 1580, but probably it was not invented at all. It was a lineal descendant of the violone, the low bass of the viol family. By making the body thicker and the strings heavier, a bigger volume of tone was obtained, but doubtless at the expense of some of the suavity and mellowness of the older instrument. However, the double bass was more serviceable in the orchestra.

Dragonetti lived from 1763 to 1846 and was celebrated for his magnificent tone, which may have been largely due to his exceptionally fine bass made by Di Salo. Bottesini played on a three-stringed basso da camera with a bow resembling that of the cello. Many double bass players use such a bow now, but the prevailing bass has four strings. Some have five and, as Arnold Dolmetsch grumbled, the bass may get back to the original six of the violone. Why not? The more strings the more technic.

Mr. Koussevitzky was content with a conventional bass of moderate size and having four strings, of which the upper two did the major portion of the work. He played with a bow such as all our orchestral players formerly used, called the "underhand" bow, and not the cello type adopted by the Parisian bass players about 1830. But his bowing was entirely free from the "ripping" effect observed in old fashioned bass playing. It was suave and elegant and caressed the strings so that they responded with their loveliest tonal secrets.

The program began with a "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti, in which Henri Casadesus of the Society of Ancient Instruments, Paris, joined Mr. Koussevitzky, playing on a viola d'amore, member of the obsolete viol family. The same composer was also represented later by a "Petite Suite," played by M. Casadesus. There were two Lorenzitis—Antoine, born in The Hague in 1740, and his brother and pupil, Bernard, born in Kircheim in 1764. Both wrote chamber music. The works heard last evening were by the younger. The second number on the program was Mr. Koussevitzky's own concerto for double bass, and this was followed by Borghi's sonata for viola and bass. Luigi Borghi, a distinguished pupil of Pugnani, was principal second violin at the Handel commemoration in London in 1784. He left, among other works, six sonatas for violin with bass. Four shorter numbers, including Mr. Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature," completed the list.

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerto it can be said that, while it was not intrinsically music of distinguished character, it disclosed fastidious taste in its demands upon the instrument and a fondness for flowing melody with sentiment behind it. The harmonics with which the slow movement ended were extraordinarily beautiful and must have brought a new tonal tint to the ears of most listeners. There are bass harmonics in the Nile scene of "Aida," but they are lost in the general harmony. Mr. Koussevitzky's stood out in all their nakedness and had no reason to be ashamed. Furthermore the concerto made no foolish attempt to display the possibilities of the bass in rapid passages. There was a bit of floridity just before the close, but it was most discreetly written.

The charms of Mr. Casadesus's viola d'amore were not lost upon the audience. It was easy to recognize the presence of a master playing upon an instrument of peculiarly well-marked individuality. He too worked some magic with his harmonics. Pierre Luboschutz was at the piano and at times furnished somewhat more tone than was advisable. The concert was interesting partly because of its archaic contributions, partly by the use of unusual instruments, and mostly by its disclosure of musicianship and fine taste. Mr. Koussevitky's conception of virtuosity did not construe it as a display of technical fireworks, but of perfect command of the most captivating resources of the double bass as a singer of cantilena. The audience was of course as large as the h[illegible]

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

Wields Baton and Plays Viol Solos

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, gave a most remarkable concert Tuesday evening in New York city on his double bass viol. The renowned director is but one of a few masters on this cumbersome instrument, having started his career with it at the age of 14. He gained widespread fame in this field before winning laurels as a symphony conductor.

Shortly after his arrival in America for the season with the Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky played for phonograph recordings of his favorite solos. He will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Memorial hall, Thursday, Nov. 1.

Season tickets for the Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts are on sale now at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Unpaid-for reservations will be released Thursday.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 28

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch

His Orchestra Opens Symphony Club Season Thursday at Memorial.

FROM a Boston correspondent comes excerpts from an interview with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear with the world-famous band of musicians in Memorial hall next Thursday evening.

The scribe visited Mr. Koussevitzky at his home at Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston.

"There was nothing Slavic about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword and other Civil war relics," says the Boston writer.

"The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

"Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"'I have come in contact with a number of American audiences,' he said, 'not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York state and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close "rapport".'"

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

PROBABLY you'll be interested to know what the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra will play when it comes to Masonic hall next Wednesday evening, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, noted for his daring in presenting unusual works. The first number will be the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony." Second, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faune," which is very familiar to a Cleveland audience. Third, excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." The second part of the program will be devoted to Brahm's Second Symphony.

* * *

NOTHING on the above program is startling to a Cleveland audience. We heard Prokofieff in [illegible]

THE CHAPERON'S COMMENT ON SOCIETY

Early Fall Society Interests of Matrons and Debutantes Are Varied

By The Chaperon

A VARIETY of interests holds the attention of the Fashionable World these days as matrons and debutantes attend benefit card parties and charity bazars, matinee lectures and Chatterbox rehearsals.

The concert that ordinarily would be given tonight in the series of the Eastman Theater will take place Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard. The date was changed to meet the demands of the tour of the orchestra.

The social world also is looking forward to the second lecture in the series by Dr. Arthur J. May of the history department of the University of Rochester, Tuesday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock in the parish house of Christ Episcopal Church, East Avenue. Tea will be served at the close of his lecture.

The committee of hostesses in charge is composed of Mrs. Robert Holmes, Mrs. George W. Stafford, Mrs. Leonard M. Gard and Miss Grace Schneider.

* * *

[illegible] as one of the favorites of our own symphony regulars.

* * *

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

1920

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky played his contra-bass [illegible] the other evening, he came on the stage with his bow, and a gentleman carried out the big 'fiddle." It would not have been so strange, except that the keeper of the instrument had on white gloves (evidently to keep him from smudging the wood or from touching the strings.) A chair on the stage awaited an occupant, but finally Koussevitzky rested the fiddle against it.

In front of me, there sat two well known violinists, who repeatedly looked toward each other, shook their heads as if to say, "I never thought it possible," and went on listening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
OCT 26 1920

Magnificent liner Lapland like atmosphere, sailing (22 days); Feb. 25. (16 April 6, (11 days).
RED STAR
INTERNATIONAL MERC
J. C. Kalbfleisch Co., Gilbert, Powers Bldg., or any authorized. ste chestra brought to a standard of playing artistry equal to any it has achieved, and that artistry seems justly described as a heritage of the conductors who succeeded.

Koussevitski is credited by the Boston critics the equal of any in the land in experience and ripened judgment, with bringing the orchestra to a brilliance and capacity for [illegible]echnical exploits as great as it has [illegible]er achieved. Certainly the Rochester concert under Koussevitski's conducting was one to remember. But under whatever conductor the orchestra is now heard, it plays with traditions set through the leadership of an illustrious directorate, and not the least in deserved recognition of this directorate is William Gericke.

[illegible]ervice with the Boston Symphony, it is debatable whether Gericke did not do as much as any of its conductors to secure the superiority of performance that the orchestra achieved and maintained. This is set down as a matter of

INFORMATION OBSCURED

199

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The English Singers Visit Brooklyn at the Behest of the Institute—A Double-Bass Virtuoso.

BEFORE an audience alternately deeply interested and amused, the English Singers gave last evening their first Academy of Music concert this season. Disposed about their table, part-books in hand, they presented a familiar spectacle, and the program, too, that they gave was familiar, though only in its character a survey of Elizabethan music. The madrigals, ballets, folk songs and duets that it comprised were those selected during the past summer to increase the repertory of the Singers and to add to the interest of novelty to their concerts in America.

It would be superfluous to praise lengthily the work, individual and collective, of the Singers. The excellent quality of the vocal material devoted in the interests of this ensemble is widely known and admired, and the virtuosity disclosed in its performance of excessively difficult a capella music has many times been enthusiastically, though never extravagantly, represented to the public. Nor is it necessary to stress the uniqueness of the English Singers, to whom we are indebted for the restoration of a musical treasure long enjoyed only by the student and the historian of the greatest of the arts. Since the English Singers made their first appearance in New York, a number of similar groups have been organized, and there has been a marked revival in the interest in English music of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries. For these services, if not for the entertainment afforded by their performances, we should be obliged to be grateful.

According to his custom, Mr. Kelly interspersed the program with remarks and discussions on the numbers sung, explaining the origin as well as the characteristics of the various musical forms represented in the selections. The composers of the evening included Weelkes, Bateson, Ward, Morley, Dowland Bartlet, Jones and Bennet. Two Shakesperean settings by Henry Purcess and John of Fornsete's "Sumer Is Icumen In" appeared on the latter half of the program, and here also room was found for several duets.

* * *

Unfortunately, we were unable to enjoy the full program offered by the Singers, for, while they appeared at the Academy of Music, a recital of unique interest, if of negligible importance, was taking place at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussewitsky, the majesterial conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presenting himself to New York as a double-bass virtuoso, a role in which he was once continentally known and admired.

It would be difficult, and it is unnecessary, to determine the amount of skill with which Mr. Koussewitsky played Borghi, Eccles, Beethoven and Lasca on the least favored and most utilitarian of the stringed instruments. Mr. Koussewitsky is probably the only or at least one of the very few musicians alive who publicly profess double-bass virtuosity. His recital was without parallel in our memory, or in available records of the musical activities of this city, and for this reason, as well as out of compliment to the distinguished rank of the soloist, called for recognition.

Mr. Koussewitsky was assisted by Henri Casadesus, who played the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist. His program included, in addition to music by the composers whom we have already named, a Concerto of his own composition. This, unfortunately, we did not arrive in time to hear. Perhaps some one of these days Mr. Koussewitsky may be prevailed upon to perform it with the Boston Orchestra, resigning his baton for the occasion into the hands of Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster.

OTHER MUSIC.

A single impression stands out from among the many made upon the writer by John Charles Thomas' recital in the Town Hall last evening: the impression that slowly but surely Mr. Thomas is learning how to sing. The extraordinary beauty of his voice, which no one has thought to question, has in the past shown to poor advantage owing to Mr. Thomas' lack of skill and taste in its management. He was apparently content with the favor of an undiscriminating and easily satisfied public, caring little for the opinion of those who deplored his carelessness of musical effect. Last evening Mr. Thomas sang intelligently, considerate of the poetic and emotional values of the better songs on his program. Should he persevere with humanity in this direction, he should soon find himself among the two or three foremost singers of the day.

R. Z.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondracki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other numbers on the program are Prokofieff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and esteemed friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov. 9 and 10.

Jean Bedetti, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Felix Fox, pianist, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor and pianist, will give a concert tonight in Jordan hall. The program is one of unusual interest. C. P. Bach's Concerto No. 3, A major, accompanied by strings, will be performed for the first time in Boston. The sonata for violoncello and piano by Alfano, whose opera "The Resurrection" was performed here by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, will also he heard for the first time in this city. Other compositions are Kodaly's Sonata for the violoncello alone; a Chant Elegiaque by Gaston Elcus, a valued violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and pieces by Granados and Popper. In Kodaly's Sonata, which will be played here for the second time, the G and C strings are tuned a half tone.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 2

* * *

Boston Director

Olin Downes of The New York Times ranks Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony of the three

Serge Koussevitzky in Recital

Boston Symphony Conductor Pleases Vast Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital last night in Carnegie Hall, playing superbly on a double bass, and a great audience went into raptures over the achievements of a man who became a virtuoso on the ponderous fiddle in spite of himself.

For Mr. Koussevitzky went to a conservatory to study something quite different, but as he was too poor to pay he was glad to accept a scholarship. The only one open was for the double bass. He became a double bass player, and learned to love it. There are writers who declare that he is one of the three great masters the instrument has had, the other two being Dragonetti and Bottesini.

The double bass was at one time said to have been invented by Gaspar di Salo, the famous violin maker, in 1580, but probably it was not invented at all. It was a lineal descendant of the violone, the low bass of the viol family. By making the body thicker and the strings heavier, a bigger volume of tone was obtained, but doubtless at the expense of some of the suavity and mellowness of the older instrument. However, the double bass was more serviceable in the orchestra.

Dragonetti lived from 1763 to 1846 and was celebrated for his magnificent tone, which may have been largely due to his exceptionally fine bass made by Di Salo. Bottesini played on a three-stringed basso da camera with a bow resembling that of the cello. Many double bass players use such a bow now, but the prevailing bass has four strings. Some have five and, as Arnold Dolmetsch grumbled, the bass may get back to the original six of the violone. Why not? The more strings the more technic.

Mr. Koussevitzky was content with a conventional bass of moderate size and having four strings, of which the upper two did the major portion of the work. He played with a bow such as all our orchestral players formerly used, called the "underhand" bow, and not the cello type adopted by the Parisian bass players about 1830. But his bowing was entirely free from the "ripping" effect observed in old fashioned bass playing. It was suave and elegant and caressed the strings so that they responded with their loveliest tonal secrets.

The program began with a "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti, in which Henri Casadesus of the Society of Ancient Instruments, Paris, joined Mr. Koussevitzky, playing on a viola d'amore, member of the obsolete viol family. The same composer was also represented later by a "Petite Suite," played by M. Casadesus. There were two Lorenzitis—Antoine, born in The Hague in 1740, and his brother and pupil, Bernard, born in Kircheim in 1764. Both wrote chamber music. The works heard last evening were by the younger. The second number on the program was Mr. Koussevitzky's own concerto for double bass, and this was followed by Borghi's sonata for viola and bass. Luigi Borghi, a distinguished pupil of Pugnani, was principal second violin at the Handel commemoration in London in 1784. He left, among other works, six sonatas for violin with bass. Four shorter numbers, including Mr. Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature," completed the list.

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerto it can be said that, while it was not intrinsically music of distinguished character, it disclosed fastidious taste in its demands upon the instrument and a fondness for flowing melody with sentiment behind it. The harmonics with which the slow movement ended were extraordinarily beautiful and must have brought a new tonal tint to the ears of most listeners. There are bass harmonics in the Nile scene of "Aida," but they are lost in the general harmony. Mr. Koussevitzky's stood out in all their nakedness and had no reason to be ashamed. Furthermore the concerto made no foolish attempt to display the possibilities of the bass in rapid passages. There was a bit of floridity just before the close, but it was most discreetly written.

The charms of Mr. Casadesus's viola d'amore were not lost upon the audience. It was easy to recognize the presence of a master playing upon an instrument of peculiarly well-marked individuality. He too worked some magic with his harmonics. Pierre Luboschutz was at the piano and at times furnished somewhat more tone than was advisable. The concert was interesting partly because of its archaic contributions, partly by the use of unusual instruments, and mostly by its disclosure of musicianship and fine taste. Mr. Koussevitky's conception of virtuosity did not construe it as a display of technical fireworks, but of perfect command of the most captivating resources of the double bass as a singer of cantilena. The audience was of course as large as the hall could hold comfortably and in it were many musicians of prominence to whom such an entertainment must have offered matters for consideration lying beyond the ken of the enthusiastic amateurs engaged in warming their hands in demonstrations of delight.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

Wields Baton and Plays Viol Solos

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, gave a most remarkable concert Tuesday evening in New York city on his double bass viol. The renowned director is but one of a few masters on this cumbersome instrument, having started his career with it at the age of 14. He gained widespread fame in this field before winning laurels as a symphony conductor.

Shortly after his arrival in America for the season with the Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky played for phonograph recordings of his favorite solos. He will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Memorial hall, Thursday, Nov. 1.

Season tickets for the Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts are on sale now at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Unpaid-for reservations will be released Thursday.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
[illegible]N
Dispatch

His Orchestra Opens Symphony Club Season Thursday at Memorial.

FROM a Boston correspondent comes excerpts from an interview with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear with the world-famous band of musicians in Memorial hall next Thursday evening.

The scribe visited Mr. Koussevitzky at his home at Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston.

"There was nothing Slavic about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword and other Civil war relics," says the Boston writer.

"The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

"Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"'I have come in contact with a number of American audiences,' he said, 'not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York state and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close "rapport".'"

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

PROBABLY you'll be interested to know what the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra will play when it comes to Masonic hall next Wednesday evening, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, noted for his daring in presenting unusual works. The first number will be the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony." Second, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faune," which is very familiar to a Cleveland audience. Third, excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." The second part of the program will be devoted to Brahm's Second Symphony.

* * *

NOTHING on the above program is startling to a Cleveland audience. We heard Prokofieff in recital at Masonic hall. We heard and saw Ravel at the Cleveland Museum of Art and at Masonic hall last year. The Debussy number was danced by the DeDiaghileff ballet at the Cleveland Hippodrome and the music has been played so often by Mr. Sokoloff and the Cleveland orchestra that it was requested last year for one of the children's concerts. And the Brahms symphony is one of the favorites of our own symphony regulars.

* * *

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
1928

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky played his contra-bass recital the other evening, he came on the stage with his bow, and a gentleman carried out the big 'fiddle." It would not have been so strange, except that the keeper of the instrument had on white gloves (evidently to keep him from smudging the wood or from touching the strings.) A chair on the stage awaited an occupant, but finally Koussevitzky rested the fiddle against it.

In front of me, there sat two well known violinists, who repeatedly looked toward each other, shook their heads as if to say, "I never thought it possible," and went on listening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle
OCT 2 8 1928

Memories of Boston Symphony and Its Conductors Playing under

The Boston Symphony ... latest periods of ac... the Eastman Theatre ... Boston Symphony ... evening, Oct. 29, w... music world fol... witski conducting ... after Gericke's ... first heard that ... orchestra; the ... hearing was ... ved him found ... was the con... instrument ... through ... Gericke was ... cities, h... somewhat ... hear th... concerned ... and in ... chestra ... k of a ... to a standard of ... playing ... ty equal to any it has ... achieved, and that artistry seems ... justly described as a heritage of ... the conductors who succeeded. ... Koussevitski is credited by the ... Boston critics the equal of any in ... the land in experience and ripened ... judgment, with bringing the orches... tra to a brilliance and capacity for ... technical exploits as great as it has ... ever achieved. Certainly the Roch... ester concert under Koussevitski's ... conducting was one to remember. ... But under whatever conductor the ... orchestra is now heard, it plays ... with traditions set through the ... leadership of an illustrious direc... torate, and not the least in de... served recognition of this direc... torate is William Gericke.

...ervice with the Boston Symphony, ... it is debatable whether Gericke did ... not do as much as any of its con... ductors to secure the superiority of ... performance that the orchestra ... achieved and maintained. This is set down as a matter of ...aried

...hold ... section of the Fash... ionable World these days as matrons and debutantes attend benefit card parties and charity bazars, matinee lectures and Chatterbox rehearsals.

The concert that ordinarily would be given tonight in the series of the Eastman Theater will take place Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard. The date was changed to meet the demands of the tour of the orchestra.

The social world also is looking forward to the second lecture in the series by Dr. Arthur J. May of the history department of the University of Rochester, Tuesday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock in the parish house of Christ Episcopal Church, East Avenue. Tea will be served at the close of his lecture.

The committee of hostesses in charge is composed of Mrs. Robert Holmes, Mrs. George W. Stafford, Mrs. Leonard M. Gard and Miss Grace Schneider.

* * *

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

The English Singers Visit Brooklyn at the Behest of the Institute—A Double-Bass Virtuoso.

BEFORE an audience alternately deeply interested and amused, the English Singers gave last evening their first Academy of Music concert this season. Disposed about their table, part-books in hand, they presented a familiar spectacle, and the program, too, that they gave was familiar, though only in its character a survey of Elizabethan music. The madrigals, ballets, folk songs and duets that it comprised were those selected during the past summer to increase the repertory of the Singers and to add to the interest of novelty to their concerts in America.

It would be superfluous to praise lengthily the work, individual and collective, of the Singers. The excellent quality of the vocal material devoted in the interests of this ensemble is widely known and admired, and the virtuosity disclosed in its performance of excessively difficult a capella music has many times been enthusiastically, though never extravagantly, represented to the public. Nor is it necessary to stress the uniqueness of the English Singers, to whom we are indebted for the restoration of a musical treasure long enjoyed only by the student and the historian of the greatest of the arts. Since the English Singers made their first appearance in New York, a number of similar groups have been organized, and there has been a marked revival in the interest in English music of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth centuries. For these services, if not for the entertainment afforded by their performances, we should be obliged to be grateful.

According to his custom, Mr. Kelly interspersed the program with remarks and discussions on the numbers sung, explaining the origin as well as the characteristics of the various musical forms represented in the selections. The composers of the evening included Weelkes, Bateson, Ward, Morley, Dowland Bartlet, Jones and Bennet. Two Shakesperean settings by Henry Purcess and John of Fornsete's "Sumer Is Icumen In" appeared on the latter half of the program, and here also room was found for several duets.

* * *

Unfortunately, we were unable to enjoy the full program offered by the Singers, for, while they appeared at the Academy of Music, a recital of unique interest, if of negligible importance, was taking place at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Koussewitsky, the majesterial conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was presenting himself to New York as a double-bass virtuoso, a role in which he was once continentally known and admired.

It would be difficult, and it is unnecessary, to determine the amount of skill with which Mr. Koussewitsky played Borghi, Eccles, Beethoven and Lasca on the least favored and most utilitarian of the stringed instruments. Mr. Koussewitsky is probably the only or at least one of the very few, musicians alive who publicly profess double-bass virtuosity. His recital was without parallel in our memory, or in available records of the musical activities of this city, and for this reason, as well as out of compliment to the distinguished rank of the soloist, called for recognition.

Mr. Koussewitsky was assisted by Henri Casadesus, who played the viola d'amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, accompanist. His program included, in addition to music by the composers whom we have already named, a Concerto of his own composition. This, unfortunately, we did not arrive in time to hear. Perhaps some one of these days Mr. Koussewitsky may be prevailed upon to perform it with the Boston Orchestra, resigning his baton for the occasion into the hands of Mr. Burgin, the concert-master.

OTHER MUSIC.

A single impression stands out from among the many made upon the writer by John Charles Thomas' recital in the Town Hall last evening: the impression that slowly but surely Mr. Thomas is learning how to sing. The extraordinary beauty of his voice, which no one has thought to question, has in the past shown to poor advantage owing to Mr. Thomas' lack of skill and taste in its management. He was apparently content with the favor of an undiscriminating and easily satisfied public, caring little for the opinion of those who deplored his carelessness of musical effect. Last evening Mr. Thomas sang intelligently, considerate of the poetic and emotional values of the better songs on his program. Should he persevere with humanity in this direction, he should soon find himself among the two or three foremost singers of the day.

R. Z.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

There have been two changes in the program of the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday and Saturday this week. An Introduction and Fugue by Pick-Mangiagalli was announced for performance. This was put aside because the orchestral parts did not arrive in time. It was said that a Partita by Kondracki, a young composer born in the Ukraine region, now living in Paris, would be substituted. For some reason or other the performance of this Suite has been postponed. Ibert's "Feerique" for orchestra will be played for the first time in Boston, if not for the first time in this country. The first performance was in Paris three years ago. The other numbers on the program are Prokofieff's pretty little "Classical" symphony; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Symphony in D major (No. 2) by our old and esteemed friend, Johannes Brahms.

The orchestra next week will give concerts in Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The next concerts in Boston will be on Nov. 9 and 10.

Jean Bedetti, solo violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by Felix Fox, pianist, and Arthur Fiedler, conductor and pianist, will give a concert tonight in Jordan hall. The program is one of unusual interest. C. P. Bach's Concerto No. 3, A major, accompanied by strings, will be performed for the first time in Boston. The sonata for violoncello and piano by Alfano, whose opera "The Resurrection" was performed here by the Chicago Civic Opera Company, will also he heard for the first time in this city. Other compositions are Kodaly's Sonata for the violoncello alone; a Chant Elegiaque by Gaston Elcus, a valued violinist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and pieces by Granados and Popper. In Kodaly's Sonata, which will be played here for the second time, the G and C strings are lowered a half tone.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 28

* * *

Boston Director

Olin Downes of The New York Times ranks Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, as one of the three greatest orchestral conductors in the world. He places him alongside of Toscanini and Stokowski. The Boston organization plays in Memorial Hall on Nov. 1. The ticket sale is being conducted at the Carl Koch Co., 102 E. Broad.

Serge Koussevitzky in Recital

Boston Symphony Conductor Pleases Vast Audience at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a recital last night in Carnegie Hall, playing superbly on a double bass, and a great audience went into raptures over the achievements of a man who became a virtuoso on the ponderous fiddle in spite of himself.

For Mr. Koussevitzky went to a conservatory to study something quite different, but as he was too poor to pay he was glad to accept a scholarship. The only one open was for the double bass. He became a double bass player, and learned to love it. There are writers who declare that he is one of the three great masters the instrument has had, the other two being Dragonetti and Bottesini.

The double bass was at one time said to have been invented by Gaspar di Salo, the famous violin maker, in 1580, but probably it was not invented at all. It was a lineal descendant of the violone, the low bass of the viol family. By making the body thicker and the strings heavier, a bigger volume of tone was obtained, but doubtless at the expense of some of the suavity and mellowness of the older instrument. However, the double bass was more serviceable in the orchestra.

Dragonetti lived from 1763 to 1846 and was celebrated for his magnificent tone, which may have been largely due to his exceptionally fine bass made by Di Salo. Bottesini played on a three-stringed basso da camera with a bow resembling that of the cello. Many double bass players use such a bow now, but the prevailing bass has four strings. Some have five and, as Arnold Dolmetsch grumbled, the bass may get back to the original six of the violone. Why not? The more strings the more technic.

Mr. Koussevitzky was content with a conventional bass of moderate size and having four strings, of which the upper two did the major portion of the work. He played with a bow such as all our orchestral players formerly used, called the "underhand" bow, and not the cello type adopted by the Parisian bass players about 1830. But his bowing was entirely free from the "ripping" effect observed in old fashioned bass playing. It was suave and elegant and caressed the strings so that they responded with their loveliest tonal secrets.

The program began with a "Symphonie Concertante" by Lorenziti, in which Henri Casadesus of the Society of Ancient Instruments, Paris, joined Mr. Koussevitzky, playing on a viola d'amore, member of the obsolete viol family. The same composer was also represented later by a "Petite Suite," played by M. Casadesus. There were two Lorenzitis—Antoine, born in The Hague in 1740, and his brother and pupil, Bernard, born in Kircheim in 1764. Both wrote chamber music. The works heard last evening were by the younger. The second number on the program was Mr. Koussevitzky's own concerto for double bass, and this was followed by Borghi's sonata for viola and bass. Luigi Borghi, a distinguished pupil of Pugnani, was principal second violin at the Handel commemoration in London in 1784. He left, among other works, six sonatas for violin with bass. Four shorter numbers, including Mr. Koussevitzky's "Valse Miniature," completed the list.

Of Mr. Koussevitzky's concerto it can be said that, while it was not intrinsically music of distinguished character, it disclosed fastidious taste in its demands upon the instrument and a fondness for flowing melody with sentiment behind it. The harmonics with which the slow movement ended were extraordinarily beautiful and must have brought a new tonal tint to the ears of most listeners. There are bass harmonics in the Nile scene of "Aida," but they are lost in the general harmony. Mr. Koussevitzky's stood out in all their nakedness and had no reason to be ashamed. Furthermore the concerto made no foolish attempt to display the possibilities of the bass in rapid passages. There was a bit of floridity just before the close, but it was most discreetly written.

The charms of Mr. Casadesus's viola d'amore were not lost upon the audience. It was easy to recognize the presence of a master playing upon an instrument of peculiarly well-marked individuality. He too worked some magic with his harmonics. Pierre Luboschutz was at the piano and at times furnished somewhat more tone than was advisable. The concert was interesting partly because of its archaic contributions, partly by the use of unusual instruments, and mostly by its disclosure of musicianship and fine taste. Mr. Koussevitky's conception of virtuosity did not construe it as a display of technical fireworks, but of perfect command of the most captivating resources of the double bass as a singer of cantilena. The audience was of course as large as the h[illegible] d

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

Wields Baton and Plays Viol Solos

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, gave a most remarkable concert Tuesday evening in New York city on his double bass viol. The renowned director is but one of a few masters on this cumbersome instrument, having started his career with it at the age of 14. He gained widespread fame in this field before winning laurels as a symphony conductor.

Shortly after his arrival in America for the season with the Boston orchestra, Koussevitzky played for phonograph recordings of his favorite solos. He will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert in Memorial hall, Thursday, Nov. 1.

Season tickets for the Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts are on sale now at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Unpaid-for reservations will be released Thursday.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 28

T ON SOCIETY

of Matrons and aried

holds the attention of the Fashionable World these days as matrons and debutantes attend benefit card parties and charity bazars, matinee lectures and Chatterbox rehearsals.

The concert that ordinarily would be given tonight in the series of the Eastman Theater will take place Monday night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be heard. The date was changed to meet the demands of the tour of the orchestra.

The social world also is looking forward to the second lecture in the series by Dr. Arthur J. May of the history department of the University of Rochester, Tuesday afternoon from 3 to 4 o'clock in the parish house of Christ Episcopal Church, East Avenue. Tea will be served at the close of his lecture.

The committee of hostesses in charge is composed of Mrs. Robert Holmes, Mrs. George W. Stafford, Mrs. Leonard M. Gard and Miss Grace Schneider.

* * *

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
Dispatch

His Orchestra Opens Symphony Club Season Thursday at Memorial.

FROM a Boston correspondent comes excerpts from an interview with Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear with the world-famous band of musicians in Memorial hall next Thursday evening.

The scribe visited Mr. Koussevitzky at his home at Jamaica Plain, a suburb of Boston.

"There was nothing Slavic about the old colonial house which bore the assigned number, nor about the entry hall, which was hung with a canvas of a Union general, a sword and other Civil war relics," says the Boston writer.

"The conductor entered to extend a courteous welcome. His tweeds and spats bespoke a good tailor, and perhaps a shade more attention to dress than is customary with Americans.

"Asked what he thought of his audiences in America, he spoke with quick enthusiasm.

"'I have come in contact with a number of American audiences,' he said, 'not only in Boston and New York and the cities of our regular visits, but further afield in the orchestra's occasional tours into Canada, New York state and the South. The audiences everywhere I have found particularly responsive, their reactions interesting. The only measure of success in a symphony concert is a close sympathy between orchestra and audience. I usually find there is an intimate contact, a close "rapport".'"

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

PROBABLY you'll be interested to know what the celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra will play when it comes to Masonic hall next Wednesday evening, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, noted for his daring in presenting unusual works. The first number will be the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony." Second, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faune," which is very familiar to a Cleveland audience. Third, excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe." The second part of the program will be devoted to Brahm's Second Symphony.

* * *

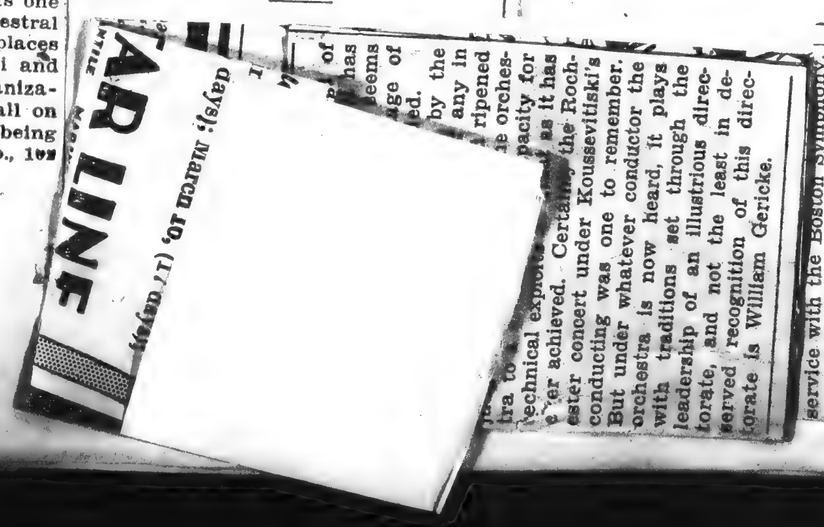
NOTHING on the above program is startling to a Cleveland audience. We heard Prokofieff in recital at Masonic hall. We heard and saw Ravel at the Cleveland Museum of Art and at Masonic hall last year. The Debussy number was danced by the DeDiaghileff ballet at the Cleveland Hippodrome and the music has been played so often by Mr. Sokoloff and the Cleveland orchestra that it was requested last year for one of the children's concerts. And the Brahms symphony is one of the favorites of our own symphony regulars.

* * *

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
1926

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky played his contra-bass recital the other evening, he came on the stage with his bow, and a gentleman carried out the big 'fiddle." It would not have been so strange, except that the keeper of the instrument had on white gloves (evidently to keep him from smudging the wood or from touching the strings.) A chair on the stage awaited an occupant, but finally Koussevitzky rested the fiddle against it.

In front of me, there sat two well known violinists, who repeatedly looked toward each other, shook their heads as if to say, "I never thought it possible," and went on listening.



COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ranked as the greatest in America, will appear before the music public of Central Ohio in the first concert of the series offered by the Symphony Club for the music public of Central in Memorial Hall.

The program to be played by the Boston, under the world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Two of the numbers on the program have never been played before by a symphony orchestra in the Ohio capital. These are the "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, and the orchestral excerpts from the second ballet suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements, will consume the entire last half of the program.

In view of the fact that the various movements of a symphony are integral parts of a masterpiece, delicately linked together, the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring the series of concerts, has given orders to its ushers not to permit any one to take their seats between movements of a number.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. The single seat sale for the Boston will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras will be sold exclusively.

The Boston program is as follows.

Beethoven .....
...Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Prokofieff .....
....."Classical" symphony, Op. 25
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale
(First time in Columbus)
Ravel ..... Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet (Second Suite)
Lever due Jour—Pantomime .....
..... Danse Generale
(First time in Columbus)
Intermission
Brahms .....
...Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

Dr. M. H. Lichliter of First Congregational Church will lecture at 7:30 p. m. Sunday at the church on the composers whose works are to be presented Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. G. G. Grabill, organist, will play the first movement from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and also several compositions by Brahms.

Madame Gray - Lhevinne who will sing in concert Tuesday evening at Capital University.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

Musical Art Jumps A Difficult Hurdle

ONE, it would seem, who attended the recital in Carnegie Hall of a virtuoso accomplished on the double bass, received the full worth of his money in novelty as well as comfort to the ear. This Serge Koussevitzky, it appears from the accounts of startled and admiring commentators, has attained a degree of expertness which enables him to extract melodious, even brilliant, effects from the instrument most unlikely of all, with the possible exception of the bass drum.

In the orchestra, as everybody knows, the double-bass—or bass viol or bull fiddle, as it is otherwise known—serves its valuable, indispensable end. With sepulchral zoom-zooming, it does its portion to impart balance and completeness to the effect. Considered, and heard, by itself, the double-bass part of any orchestral composition imaginably would be uneventful, monotonous and without stirring appeal. An expert double-bassist, intimately acquainted with the great orchestral masterpieces, is said to derive great pleasure from playing over his parts in solo manner, being enabled to hear those seraphic harmonies of his long acquaintance. But the casual auditor is not so blessed.

There is a little lesson, doubtless, in this performance which has been described as extraordinary. One took in hand a most unpromising implement and from it brought surprising results. So with all of us, the writer of inspirational articles probably would say. With the means available, be they ever so humble, and with resolve and application, we can accomplish great, even amazing, things.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

Boston Symphony Here On Monday

"No nation has done more than North America in the cause of music" declares Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, who will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concert Monday night at 8:30 in the Eastman Theater as the opening event in series B. The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the only one in Series B. which has been scheduled for a night other than Friday.

Koussevitzky's glowing praise of America's efforts in the cause of good music have been the source of inspiration during the past five years that he has been connected with the Boston organization. His approval of American endeavors to sponsor the creative genius of this country, his ready appreciation of every advance being made, his realization of the nation-wide interest in music, and his wholehearted sympathy with American musical tastes, aside from his brilliance as one of the greatest orchestra leaders in the world, have made him one of the most popular conductors who has ever come to this country.

This eminent Russian orchestral genius has deplored the opinion that Europeans have concerning American musical progress. "Europeans generally confound American music with jazz," Koussevitzky says, and on the continent the terms "jazz" and "American music," are often used synonpmously," Koussevitzky has been one of the most rigouous defenders this country has yet had, endeavoring to correct this erroneous impression of our musical status abroad.

"Jazz," declares Koussevitzky [illegible]s on the wane in the [illegible]ates." Of negro origin, [illegible]uct of dancing, spread by [illegible]ular taste but of little repute [illegible]h the higher strata of life, it has been the object of a passing vogue, where in Europe, and France in particular is outlasting America. Its origin alone would have been enough to turn true Americans from it; moreover, they have quickly sensed the monotony inherent in jazz."

Seats for the concert by the Boston Orchestra are now on sale at the Eastman Theater box office.

The Program

"Classical Symphony," Op. 25 ..... Prokofieff
(a) Allegro
(b) Larghetto
(c) Gavotte
(d) Finale
(First time in Rochester)
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) Eclogue by S. Mallarme ....Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Dephnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Dance Generale ..... Ravel
(First time in Rochester)
Promenade Intermission
Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
(a) Allegro non troppo
(b) Adagio non troppo
(c) Allegretto grozioso, quasi andantino.
(d) Allegro con spirito

Fortunate City

Columbus should feel fortunate over the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, in Memorial Hall, under the direction of the famous Russian virtuoso, Serge Koussevitzky.

This good fortune is not only because of the qualities of the organization, but because its engagements are few outside of its Boston and New York appearances.

The November tour of a week includes appearances in Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus, Cleveland and Pittsburgh.

Single seats for the Boston concert will go on sale Wednesday at the box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. In the meanwhile, season tickets for the Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts are on sale there.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

* * *

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, gave long expected recital in New York, g ing a well selected program on double bass violin. Mr. Koussevits was a famous virtuoso upon his seld heard instrument before his conducti days. Henri Casadesus came fr France specially to play the vic d'amore at this recital. The acco panist was Pierre Luboshutz.

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

* * *

Full Grown Chamber Music.

An inadvertence caused the writer to say that the "Symphonic Concertante," played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, was by the younger Lorenziti. It was by the elder, named Antoine. Having thus done justice to this estimable gentleman, who for the last century and a half has not cared what was said about him, we may felicitate ourselves on the reintroduction of his music to the concert room. A composition for viola d'amore and double bass is not the sort of thing that is likely to become prevalent, but we should like to hear some of the other inventions of this oldtime musician.

It is an unfortunate fact that public performers usually follow the line of least resistance in selecting their music. We hear the same works year after year. But there must a mass of full grown chamber music, such as the sonata of Borghi on the Koussevitky program, that has never been heard here. Sam Franko used to unearth treasures for his concerts of old music and quite recently Sir Thomas Beecham delighted New York with some novelties by Handel.

It is not difficult to get Handel music, but scores by the Lorenzitis and Borghi have not benefited by the affectionate labor of any learned "gesellschaft.' There must be hundreds of scores quite worthwhile, all written by men whose very names have disappeared from the dictionaries of music. For example, there is not a line about the two Lorenzitis in Grove's Dictionary and a bare dozen about Borghi, who got in probably because he settled in London and played in the Handel commemoration concerts.

...

There might be one grave objection to removing from the dusty shelves of oblivion many ancient works by forgotten masters. That objection suggested itself to this music lover while he was listening to the "Symphonie Concertante" of Lorenziti and recognizing old friends among the melodies. Some of the best themes in nineteenth and twentieth century music were doubtless heard first in music by seventeenth and eighteenth century composers.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not only a conductor, but a player of the double-bass instrument. His mastery of this instrument brought him fame before his debut [illegible]n-ducting [illegible]

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its season in Symphony Hall Oct 5 with Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 3" and "Eroica" symphony; two of the Debussy nocturnes and Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, op. 38. Philip Hale of The Boston Herald, referring to the compositions of Debussy and Hindemith, said in part:

"Objection was made some seasons ago by a stickler for literal interpretation to Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of 'Festivals,' especially the dazzling vision of a procession—'Debussy never wanted it to go that way.' Now, no one of us in Boston knows exactly how Debussy wished 'Festivals' to be played. A printed score is at the best only a suggestion to a conductor. It is the conductor's duty—as has been wisely said—to find out and express what is not in the printed page. The composer may have thought better than he knew, but failed to make his thoughts clear. Eloquent in thought, he may have stammered in writing. It is our own belief that if Debussy could have heard his 'Festivals' yesterday he would have gone on the platform and, in the face of the public, embraced Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Hindemith's concerto was produced here—for the first time in this country—in March, 1926. Eminent critics in Europe believe that Hindemith is the coming man; equally eminent critics look upon him as a fresh and arrogant person who strives to make the bourgeoisie sit up. Some insist that his music is interesting only for its rhythmic intensity and fire; that his melodic ideas are thin; his polytonality confusion and the abomination of desolation. To us the first movement of this concerto is chiefly a waste of energy; in itself as conventional as any academic allegro of a third-rate sweating German Kapellmeister. Let it be noted that 'Kapellmeister' mus is often written by extreme modernists The uninspired Kapellmeist[illegible] in of

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

It is interesting to note that Olin Downes, of the New York Times selects as the three outstanding musical personalities among present day conductors Stokowsky, Toscanini and Koussevitski. The interest is accentuated for Rochester music lovers in that two of the three are to conduct concerts here in the Eastman Theater this season, Koussevitski tomorrow night.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

200

Rochester to Hear Ravel's Masterpiece

Koussevitski Rated Best Interpreter of This Music

Of the virtuoso performances by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of its gifted Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky, nothing has made a finer impression than Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite which will have its first Rochester performance when the noted organization opens Series B concerts at the Eastman Theater tomorrow night. Last season when the distinguished French composer had only just landed in America he went to Carnegie Hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel" program. After the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite in particular, composer, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation by the great audience.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant with his characteristic [illegible] and [illegible]ages this [illegible]l by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas.

Writing in the New York Times Olin Downes said: Mr.Koussevitzky outdistances any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the "Daphnis and Chloe" music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music; none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty; none which brought into existence again as by magic, the most subtle and precise essence of the composer's thought. And here of course, was special opportunity for the orchestra which Mr. Koussevitsky has perfected, sensitized and energized so remarkably in a few seasons, to show itself in all its glory."

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester on a Monday evening instead of Friday night because its touring schedule permits only a Monday engagement in Rochester. Rather than deny the music lovers of the city the opportunity to hear one of the first three greatest orchestras in the world the Eastman concert committee decided to deviate from the rule of concerts on Friday nights only.

Tomorrow night's concert will begin at 8:30 o'clock. Seats are now selling at the Eastman concert box office.

The complete program follows:

"Classical Symphony," Opt. 25 ..... Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
(First Rochester Performance)
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un (The Afternoon of Faun) Eclogue by S. Mallarme ..... Dubussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour, Pantomine, Dance Generale ..... Ravel
(First Rochester Performance)
Promenade Intermission
Symphony No. 3 in D Major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto graziso, quesi andantino
Allegro con spirito

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

[illegible]e of the delightful affairs of the week will be the recital by the Society of Chamber Music, by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will [illegible]er the auspices of the Department of Music of Mount Saint Joseph Academy in the Academy Auditorium at Main street and Humboldt parkway on Tuesday afternoon, October 30th at four o'clock sharp. A program of artistic character will be presented, and lovers of chamber music should avail themselves of this opportunity to hear these noted ensemble players.

* * *

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, ranked as the greatest in America, will appear before the music public of Central Ohio in the first concert of the series offered by the Symphony Club for the music public of Central in Memorial Hall.

The program to be played by the Boston, under the world-famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Two of the numbers on the program have never been played before by a symphony orchestra in the Ohio capital. These are the "Classical Symphony," by Prokofieff, and the orchestral excerpts from the second ballet suite of "Daphnis and Chloe," by Ravel.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, with its four movements, will consume the entire last half of the program.

In view of the fact that the various movements of a symphony are integral parts of a masterpiece, delicately linked together, the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, which is sponsoring the series of concerts, has given orders to its ushers not to permit any one to take their seats between movements of a number.

The program will commence promptly at 8:15 p. m. and all patrons are urged to be in their seats at that time. The single seat sale for the Boston will not be opened at the box office at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets, until Wednesday morning. Until that time season tickets for the entire series, including the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit orchestras will be sold exclusively.

The Boston program is as follows.

Beethoven
...Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Prokofieff
..."Classical" symphony, Op. 25
I. Allegro
II. Larghetto
III. Gavotte
IV. Finale
(First time in Columbus)
Ravel ..... Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet (Second Suite)
Lever due Jour—Pantomime .....
..... Danse Generale
(First time in Columbus)
Intermission
Brahms .....
...Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio non troppo
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
IV. Allegro con spirito

Dr. M. H. Lichliter of First Con-

Madame Gray - Lhevinne who will sing in concert Tuesday evening at Capital University.

gregational Church will lecture at 7:30 p. m. Sunday at the church on the composers whose works are to be presented Thursday evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. G. G. Grabill, organist, will play the first movement from Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and also several compositions by Brahms.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES UNION

country, his ready appreciation of every advance being made, his realization of the nation-wide interest in music, and his wholehearted sympathy with American musical tastes, aside from his brilliance as one of the greatest orchestra leaders in the world, have made him one of the most popular conductors who has ever come to this country.

This eminent Russian orchestral genius has deplored the opinion that Europeans have concerning American musical progress. "Europeans generally confound American music with jazz," Koussevitzky says, and on the continent the terms "jazz" and "American music," are often used synonpmously," Koussevitzky has been one of the most rigouous defenders this country has yet had, endeavoring to correct this erroneous impression of our musical status abroad.

"Jazz" declares Koussevitzky is on the wane in the ates." Of negro origin, uct of dancing, spread by ular taste but of little repute th the higher strata of life, it has been the object of a passing vogue, where in Europe, and France in particular is outlasting America. Its origin alone would

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

Musical Art Jumps A Difficult Hurdle

ONE, it would seem, who attended recital in Carnegie Hall of a tuoso accomplished on the double received the full worth of his mon novelty as well as comfort to the This Serge Koussevitzky, it appears the accounts of startled and admi commentators, has attained a degre expertness which enables him to ext melodious, even brilliant, effects fr the instrument most unlikely of all, with the possible exception of the bass drum.

In the orchestra, as everybody knows, the double-bass—or bass viol or bull fiddle, as it is otherwise known—serves its valuable, indispensable end. With sepulchral zoom-zooming, it does its portion to impart balance and completeness to the effect. Considered, and heard, by itself, the double-bass part of any orchestral composition imaginably would be uneventful, monotonous and without stirring appeal. An expert double-bassist, intimately acquainted with the great orchestral masterpieces, is said to derive great pleasure from playing over his parts in solo manner, being enabled to hear those seraphic harmonies of his long acquaintance. But the casual auditor is not so blessed.

There is a little lesson, doubtless, in this performance which has been described as extraordinary. One took in hand a most unpromising implement and from it brought surprising results. So with all of us, the writer of inspirational articles probably would say. With the means available, be they ever so humble, and with resolve and application, we can accomplish great, even amazing, things.

N. Y. SUN

Music and Musicians

By W. J. HENDERSON

Full Grown Chamber Music.

An inadvertence caused the writer to say that the "Symphonic Concertante," played by Serge Koussevitzky and Henri Casadesus in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, was by the younger Lorenziti. It was by the elder, named Antoine. Having thus done justice to this estimable gentleman, who for the last century and a half has not cared what was said about him, we may felicitate ourselves on the reintroduction of his music to the concert room. A composition for viola d'amore and double bass is not the sort of thing that is likely to become prevalent, but we should like to hear some of the other inventions of this oldtime musician.

It is an unfortunate fact that public performers usually follow the line of least resistance in selecting their music. We hear the same works year after year. But there must a mass of full grown chamber music, such as the sonata of Borghi on the Koussevitky program, that has never been heard here. Sam Franko used to unearth treasures for his concerts of old music and quite recently Sir Thomas Beecham delighted New York with some novelties by Handel.

It is not difficult to get Handel music, but scores by the Lorenzitis and Borghi have not benefited by the affectionate labor of any learned "gesellschaft.' There must be hundreds of scores quite worthwhile, all written by men whose very names have disappeared from the dictionaries of music. For example, there is not a line about the two Lorenzitis in Grove's Dictionary and a bare dozen about Borghi, who got in probably because he settled in London and played in the Handel commemoration concerts.

...

There might be one grave objection to removing from the dusty shelves of oblivion many ancient works by forgotten masters. That objection suggested itself to this music lover while he was listening to the "Symphonie Concertante" of Lorenziti and recognizing old friends among the melodies. Some of the best themes in nineteenth and twentieth century music were doubtless heard first in music by seventeenth and eighteenth century composers.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is not only a conductor, but a player of the double-bass instrument. His mastery of this instrument brought him fame before his days of conducting. Mr. Koussevitzky is the first of the conductors to come to Pittsburgh this season under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. His coming is an event of next Friday night and Saturday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens the symphony season with the following programs:

FRIDAY NIGHT.
Apollon Musagete, Ballet .....Stravinsky
Nocturnes .....Debussy
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica" ..... Beethoven

SATURDAY MATINEE.
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (The Afternoon of a Faun).....Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" .....Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73..Brahms

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 2

Fortunate City

Columbus should feel fortunate over the coming visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday evening, in Memorial Hall, under the direction of the famous Russian virtuoso, Serge Koussevitzky.

This good fortune is not only because of the qualities of the organization, but because its engagements are few outside of its Boston and New York appearances.

The November tour of a week includes appearances in Rochester, Buffalo, Columbus, Cleveland and Pittsburgh.

Single seats for the Boston concert will go on sale Wednesday at the box office in the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad Sts. In the meanwhile, season tickets for the Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts are on sale there.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

* * *

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston Symphony orchestra, gave long expected recital in New York, g ing a well selected program on double bass violin. Mr. Koussevits was a famous virtuoso upon his seld heard instrument before his conducti days. Henri Casadesus came fr France specially to play the vi d'amore at this recital. The acco panist was Pierre Luboshutz.

NEW YORK TIMES

Seats $1.00 to $2.50 at Box Off. (Chickering Mgt. Wolfsohn Music Bureau of N. Y. Inc

WI...

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened its season in Symphony Hall Oct 5 with Beethoven's overture "Leonore, No. 3" and "Eroica" symphony; two of the Debussy nocturnes and Paul Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, op. 38. Philip Hale of The Boston Herald, referring to the compositions of Debussy and Hindemith, said in part:

"Objection was made some seasons ago by a stickler for literal interpretation to Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of 'Festivals,' especially the dazzling vision of a procession—'Debussy never wanted it to go that way.' Now, no one of us in Boston knows exactly how Debussy wished 'Festivals' to be played. A printed score is at the best only a suggestion to a conductor. It is the conductor's duty—as has been wisely said—to find out and express what is not in the printed page. The composer may have thought better than he knew, but failed to make his thoughts clear. Eloquent in thought, he may have stammered in writing. It is our own belief that if Debussy could have heard his 'Festivals' yesterday he would have gone on the platform and, in the face of the public, embraced Mr. Koussevitzky.

"Hindemith's concerto was produced here—for the first time in this country—in March, 1926. Eminent critics in Europe believe that Hindemith is the coming man; equally eminent critics look upon him as a fresh and arrogant person who strives to make the bourgeoisie sit up. Some insist that his music is interesting only for its rhythmic intensity and fire; that his melodic ideas are thin; his polytonality confusion and the abomination of desolation. To us the first movement of this concerto is chiefly a waste of energy; in itself as conventional as any academic allegro of a third-rate sweating German Kapellmeister. Let it be noted that 'Kapellmeister' mus is often written by extreme modernists The uninspired Kapellmeister is found in every century. In the other pages of the concerto we find genuine fancy—especially in the march with its introduction and conclusion—and indisputable originality."

...ester music lovers in that two of the three are to conduct concerts here in the Eastman Theater this season, Koussevitski tomorrow night.

200

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Rochester to Hear Ravel's Masterpiece

Koussevitski Rated Best Interpreter of This Music

Of the virtuoso performances by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of its gifted Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky, nothing has made a finer impression than Ravel's second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite which will have its first Rochester performance when the noted organization opens Series B concerts at the Eastman Theater tomorrow night. Last season when the distinguished French composer had only just landed in America he went to Carnegie Hall, New York, and sat in a box while Koussevitzky and his orchestra surprised him with the homage of a "Ravel" program. After the "Daphnis and Chloe" suite in particular, composer, conductor and orchestra were given an ovation by the great audience.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in "Daphnis and Chloe." It is abundant with his characteristic delicacy. Its sheer loveliness and grace certain woodwind passages in "Dawn" and "Pantomine" of this suite have perhaps been excelled by no other composer. This score is also probably his largest canvas.

Writing in the New York Times Olin Downes said: Mr.Koussevitzky outdistances any of his present colleagues and his orchestra gave an exhibition hardly to be surpassed in the "Daphnis and Chloe" music of Ravel. We remember no such reading of this now familiar and popular music; none which drew such magic and such throbbing beauty; none which brought into existence again as by magic, the most subtle and precise essence of the composer's thought. And here of course, was special opportunity for the orchestra which Mr. Koussevitsky has perfected, sensitized and energized so remarkably in a few seasons, to show itself in all its glory."

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester on a Monday evening instead of Friday night because its touring schedule permits only a Monday engagement in Rochester. Rather than deny the music lovers of the city the opportunity to hear one of the first three greatest orchestras in the world the Eastman concert committee decided to deviate from the rule of concerts on Friday nights only.

Tomorrow night's concert will begin at 8:30 o'clock. Seats are now selling at the Eastman concert box office.

The complete program follows:

"Classical Symphony," Opt. 25 ..... Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
(First Rochester Performance)
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un (The Afternoon of Faun) Eclogue by S. Mallarme ..... Dubussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour, Pantomine, Dance Generale ..... Ravel
(First Rochester Performance)
Promenade Intermission
Symphony No. 3 in D Major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto graziso, quesi andantino
Allegro con spirito

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

...e of the delightful affairs of the week will be the recital by the Society of Chamber Music, by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will ...er the auspices of the Department of Music of Mount Saint Joseph Academy in the Academy Auditorium at Main street and Humboldt parkway on Tuesday afternoon, October 30th at four o'clock sharp. A program of artistic character will be presented, and lovers of chamber music should avail themselves of this opportunity to hear these noted ensemble players.

NEW YORK WORLD

Concert Pitch

Koussevitzky and His Bull Fiddle; Youmans and Gershwin

By Samuel Chotzinoff

LAST Tuesday night at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a concert on the double-bass, and an audience that had come out of curiosity found itself enthralled by as beautiful and noble playing on the most unwieldy member of the string family as it had ever listened to on the more delicate and graceful representatives of the violin family.

* * *

ONE wondered, after this revelation, why Mr. Koussevitzky had for so long hidden his unique gift behind an orchestral bushel. Long before the Boston Symphony leader had thought of becoming a conductor he had attained a European fame by his virtuosity on the bull fiddle. Later he attained an equal celebrity as the conductor of an orchestra which traveled the length of the Volga River, bringing symphonic music to every landing. Mr. Koussevitzky chartered his own vessel and went sailing down the mighty river like some musical missionary or symphonic show boat. After the war this many-sided musician became the champion and exponent of the modernistic school of composition, a bias from which he has never wavered. The war having in the mean time played the devil with the once glorious Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky was imported to see what he could do to restore the morale of the troubled band. This was no small job. But Mr. Koussevitzky possessed the qualifications. He had enthusiasm, personality and courage, and in three years he had lifted the orchestra, if not to the very level of the pre-war days, at least very near it.

* * *

HAD Mr. Koussevitzky played the double-bass for us before he assumed his duties with the Boston orchestra, we would have been made aware at once of his peculiar fitness for the regeneration of the late Mr. Higginson's pride and joy. For Mr. Koussevitzky's exhibition on the gargantuan fiddle would have shown us not only that he is a great artist in the interpretative sense, but a perfectionist in the technique of his instrument. We have known conductors who were excellent musicians, but never having mastered an orchestral instrument themselves they were content with performances that on the technical side left much to be desired. Certainly, Mr. Koussevitzky, who has mastered so unyielding a musical elephant as the contra-bass, would be satisfied with nothing less than orchestral perfection in its technical aspect.

* * *

HOWEVER, if Mr. Koussevitzky had never elected to branch out into the conductorial field his fame as an instrumentalist would remain second to none, even though his vehicle is one almost never heard outside of an orchestra. In the days of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven there were great players on the contra-bass, on the horn, on the bassoon and other instruments which have since retired to the orchestra Even the 'cello is heard less in solo nowadays than it was twenty years ago, while the viola's place is exclusively in chamber and orchestral music. It may be that the democratization of music in the last hundred years has been in part responsible for the relegation of the more difficult instruments to the orchestra. Another reason may be the absence of a suitable repertoire. A composer will write music for the violin because he knows that he is writing for a great many violinists, but he might compose a piece for the double-bass only at the instigation of some master of the instrument like Koussevitzky. On the other hand, a man desiring to master an instrument will naturally favor the one which has the largest and best literature.

* * *

THE music that Mr. Koussevitzky played at his recital did not, it must be said, disclose matters which were significant in any sense, save that it gave the artist an opportunity to show us his complete command over his double-bass. To remedy the scanty repertoire Mr. Koussevitzky must have composed more for his instrument than the Concerto and the smaller piece he included in his program. Unfortunately the Concerto, which was expertly contrived for a double-bass, brought nothing more to the listener than well written passages and suave cantalina in the romantic vein of the year 1902, the date of its composition. It had, in fact, a strong resemblance to the E Minor violin concerto of Mr. Koussevitzky's countryman, Conus. But it would be unfair to expect a man to be a great instrumentalist, a great conductor and a great composer. I believe history records only two such paragons, Felix Mendelssohn and Serge Rachmaninoff.

* * *

CONSIDERING what he did with the uninspired music of his program last Tuesday, which he enhanced with a beautiful tone, matchless finger dexterity, polished phrasing and the emotional and intellectual sensibility of an experienced, thoughtful musician, all that Mr. Koussevitzky requires is a repertoire worthy of his extraordinary artistry. Perhaps if he were to give more concerts on the double-bass such a repertoire would come into being. Hearing him play no composer could resist the desire to intrust his best thoughts and emotions to the hitherto ludicrous double-bass.

* * *

ON his arrival in America about two weeks ago Mr. Fritz Kreisler told a reporter that creative musicians were pretty scarce at the present time and that in his opinion our own Messrs. Youmans and Gershwin were the exceptions. This dictum from so eminent a musician as Kreisler must have astonished our musical highbrows, especially with regard to Mr. Youmans who has never composed so much as a rhapsody. Mr. Gershwin has written both a rhapsody and a concerto and is therefore in a class a little higher than Mr. Youmans. But both boys are consistently guilty of producing musical comedies that prove enormously successful and make a great deal of money for them.

* * *

MR. KREISLER must have been pulling the reporter's leg, since he must know that no one who writes popular tunes, or even popular rhapsodies, can be a bona-fide, legitimate composer. How could he have said that creative musicians were scarce when the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Beethoven Symphony trot out a new work at every concert.

Is it possible that Mr. Kreisler prefers a good tune to a symphony or symphonic poem which our big orchestras deem good enough for performance?

* * *

IT is evident that the popular violinist is not acquainted with our critical attitude toward jazz boys like Gershwin and Youmans. The latter has as yet refrained from storming the legitimate concert halls, but the former enjoyed a meretricious success a few years ago with a piano concerto which Mr. Damrosch, in a magnanimous moment, accepted for performance by the New York Symphony Orchestra. At that time Mr. Gershwin was shown his place by the next morning's reviews. But recently Mr. Paul Whiteman gave another of his peculiar concerts which unaccountably sells out Carnegie Hall, when we were all dismayed to find Mr. Gershwin's old concerto, dressed up in jazz garments by Ferdie Grofe, the big feature of the evening.

* * *

THIS necessitated another critical spanking to the presumptuous composer of the "Man I Love" and other commercial tunes. In the morning and afternoon papers we reiterated our old opinion that Mr. Gershwin is unacquainted with the structure and form of a concerto as, indeed, how could he be? A few days later Dr. Zaslawsky, the eminent conductor of the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra, played for us a symphony by one who ought to know how to write one, since he is the head of a great American musical foundation. So Mr. Kreisler must be wrong.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
8 1928

Singers Coming Here Loudly Acclaimed in New York Concert

English Group Give Program of Folk-Songs Composed in Sixteenth Century, but Critic Promises No "Dry as Dust" Atmosphere in Any Selection.

By George Harris

The English Singers are coming to Richmond! All I can do is to burst out with the feeling that Richmond, musical and otherwise, ought to give them three loud cheers when they arrive here on Thursday. I heard them in New York last Sunday for the first time, and if I had gone up solely for their concert, up one night and back the next, I would have felt it more than worth while.

Except for the thirteenth century "rota"—"Summer is icumen in,"—and modern arrangements of English folk-songs, the music the English Singers perform was all composed between the years 1558 and 1695. This may sound as if their concerts had a dry-as-dust atmosphere, but if you could have heard the man next me in the audience last Sunday crying out "Oh, baby!" as the only adequate expression of his enthusiasm, you would realize that "dry-as-dust" is not the proper descriptive adjestice. They sing to packed houses, and at their performances there is an atmosphere of sincere and comfortable enjoyment such as one seldom finds in the jaded New York concert hall. I have heard of people going over and over again to hear the English Singers, which is unusual in America when there is no outstanding personality or famous name to mesmerize the herd.

There have been discovered recently in England quantities of madrigals and ballets (which we now call ballads) that were composed during the century before the birth of Back, and, although they were written in the classical style of what one calls strick counterpoint, this meaning that each voice is an ensemble must carry a distinct melody by itself as well as harmonize with the others voices, these easily English compositions contain a spirit of gaiety, and of beauty that seems unhindered by the exacting rules under which they were written.

It is said that in the great manor-houses, when the table was cleared after dinner, the family and its guests would still sit at the table and sing madrigals. The music had been handed out to them, and each person would sing at sight from a copy that contained his own part only, like the separate violin or oboe part in an orchestra today. These present-day English singers probably sing better than those average people did then, but they do not pretend to be great vocalists, and they sit around a table in the traditional manner with the music before them and enter into the spirit of this Elizabethan music-making with informality and enthusiasm.

In the New York papers the day after this concert that I have just heard the critics were overflowing with praise—all but one, who among other dissatisfactions found one humorous thing no better than modern vaudeville. But this critic has an unmistakeably Russian name, and probably has but little understanding of the subtleties of Anglo-Saxon humour. This concert which I heard in New York last Sunday makes me look forward with keen anticipation to this coming Thursday night, when I shall hear the English Singers again—this time in the Jefferson Auditorium.

Gives Unique Recital.

On Tuesday evening an unusual musical event took place in New York. It was a recital of music for the double-bass, or, as it is popularly called, the bass-viol. And the performer on this unwieldy and unattractive instrument was no less than Koussevitzky himself, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It seems that Koussevitzky is one of only three who have been virtuosi on the double-bass during its three hundred years' existence. It has always been considered as the necessary backbone of the orchestra, but too cumbersome to play solos on. But in the latter part of the eighteenth century there appeared a man named Dragonetti—and I cannot help wondering if his name had anything to do with his being attracted to this growling instrument—who became a great double-bass virtuoso. Haydn and Beethoven heard him play and admired him exceedingly, and it is said that Beethoven never tired of hearing him play the 'cello parts of his [illegible]

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

For his sole work Dragonetti used a bridge twice as high as was customary and unusually thick strings, and it is said that when others tried to play on Dragonetti's instrument blood actually spurted from their fingertips, so great was the pressure they had to bring to bear.

Bottesini was the second great master of the double-bass. He composed duets for double-bass and violin, and violinists such as Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski were proud to play in concert with him. These two performers used only three strings instead of four, and for their solo work tuned their instruments to a pitch slightly higher than that used in the orchestra. But Koussevitzky keeps the double-bass exactly as it is in the orchestra, resorting to no devices to make it more brilliant as a solo-instrument.

Both Bottesini and Koussevitzky took up the double-bass from necessity rather than from choice, each choosing it as the only available means of obtaining a scholarship in a musical conservatory, one in Milan and the other in Moscow. But Koussevitzky became enauoured of his instrument, and was famous in Berlin as a bass-viol virtuoso before he ever began to conduct orchestras. And so every now and again he puts down his baton and aims his bow at his first musical love.

New Season at "Met."

Tomorrow night the old yellow curtain of the Metropolitan Opera House rises for the first time since last April. The first offering is that poignant and surging work, "Amore dei Tre Re," by Montemezzi, one of the most significant and individual operas since Wagner and Verdi. Rosa Ponselle sings the leading role, and, although I have not followed the cast of every performance at the Metropolitan, I think it is her first appearance there in that opera. Judging from the development in charm and personality that she showed here last spring and from the undeviating beauty of her voice, her performance of Riora ought to be an inspiring one.

The next on the list is "Tannhauser," with Jeritza as Elizabeth. It is hoped that a vacation has sufficiently refreshed her voice to give it the beauty necessary to make interesting this rather pondrous music. On Thursday Grace Divine, a native of Cincinnati, who has appeared in concert in America, makes her bow at the Metropolitan, taking the second woman's part in Puccini's "Manon Lescaut."

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

Two Concerts By Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first of a group of celebrated conductors to come to Pittsburgh this season, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Friday night and Saturday afternoon he will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it will give the following programs: Friday — Stravinsky's Apollon Musagete, ballet; Debussy's Nocturnes; Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica." Saturday—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25; Debussy's prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune; Ravel's orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

Symphony Visit

FRIDAY—Serge Koussevitzky, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the series of visiting orchestra concerts next Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. Other orchestras to appear here this season include the New York Philharmonic for three visits, with Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini, conductors; the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland, with Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis, with Henri Verbrugghen.

201

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

On Tuesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 108 strong, with the illustrious Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the Buffalo Musical Foundation symphony series with the following program:

Classical Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
Prelude—A l'Apres-midi d'un Faune—After the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme .....Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from Daphnis et Chloe Ballet (Second Suite)...Ravel
Lever du Jour-Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 7 ..... Brahms

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony. The character of the Brahms symphony has peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to mediative seriousness.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in Daphnis and Chloe. It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer loveliness and grace, certain woodwind passages in "dawn" and "pantomine" of this suite have, perhaps, been excelled by no other composer. This score is also said to be probably his largest canvas.

The Boston Symphony concert is the first of the series of seven programs this winter in Elmwood Music hall under Foundation auspices, being followed by the Philharmonic-Symphony with Mengelberg; the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham and the Victor Kolar conducting, the Cleveland with Nikolai Sokoloff conducting, the Prague Choir under the direction of Metod Dolezil.

The Buffalo Musical Foundation office in Denton, Cottier & Daniels announces that the season sale is still on in the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, offering seven concerts for the price of six. The Boston Symphony tickets are also on sale in the box office.

* * *

NEW YORK WORLD

Horowitz Comes Here For Concert Friday

Vladimir Horowitz makes his first appearance in New York this year in a recital at Carnegie Hall on Friday night. The young Russian pianist's program opens with the "Appassionata" Sonata of Beethoven (F minor, op. 57). The second group is devoted to Brahms and includes three intermezzi (Op. 117, 118, 119) and the rhapsody (Op. 119). Chopin follows, represented by the F Minor Fantasy, two mazurkas and the Etude in C Minor (Op. 25). The last two numbers are the Schubert-Liszt "Liebesbotschaf" and the Liszt Rhapsodie Espagnole. Preceding his recital Mr. Horowitz will have played in the following cities: Mount Holyoke College, Oct. 12; Pittsburgh, Oct. 16; with the Detroit Symphony, Oct. 18 and 19; with the Boston Symphony, Oct. 21 and 23; with the Cincinnati Symphony, Oct. 24; Louisville, Oct. 25; Milwaukee, Oct. 29; St. Paul, Oct. 30.

NEW YORK WORLD

Concert Pitch

Koussevitzky and His Bull Fiddle; Youmans and Gershwin

By Samuel Chotzinoff

LAST Tuesday night at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky gave a concert on the double-bass, and an audience that had come out of curiosity found itself enthralled by as beautiful and noble playing on the most unwieldy member of the string family as it had ever listened to on the more delicate and graceful representatives of the violin family.

* * *

ONE wondered, after this revelation, why Mr. Koussevitzky had for so long hidden his unique gift behind an orchestral bushel. Long before the Boston Symphony leader had thought of becoming a conductor he [illegible] attained a European fame by his virtuosity on the bull fiddle. Later he attained an equal celebrity as the conductor of an orchestra which traveled the length of the Volga River, bringing symphonic music to every landing. Mr. Koussevitzky chartered his own vessel and went sailing down the mighty river like some musical missionary or symphonic show boat. After the war this many-sided musician became the champion and exponent of the modernistic school of composition, a bias from which he has never wavered. The war having in the mean time played the devil with the once glorious Boston Symphony, Mr. Koussevitzky was imported to see what he could do to restore the morale of the troubled band. This was no small job. But Mr. Koussevitzky possessed the qualifications. He had enthusiasm, personality and courage, and in three years he had lifted the orchestra, if not to the very level of the pre-war days, at least very near it.

* * *

HAD Mr. Koussevitzky played the double-bass for us before he assumed his duties with the Boston orchestra, we would have been made aware at once of his peculiar fitness for the regeneration of the late Mr. Higginson's pride and joy. For Mr. Koussevitzky's exhibition on the gargantuan fiddle would have shown us not only that he is a great artist in the interpretative sense, but a perfectionist in the technique of his instrument. We have known conductors who were excellent musicians, but never having mastered an orchestral instrument themselves they were content with performances that on the technical side left much to be desired. Certainly, Mr. Koussevitzky, who has mastered so unyielding a musical elephant as the contra-bass, would be satisfied with nothing less than orchestral perfection in its technical aspect.

* * *

HOWEVER, if Mr. Koussevitzky had never elected to branch out into the conductorial field his fame as an instrumentalist would remain second to none, even though his vehicle is one almost never heard outside of an orchestra. In the days of Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven there were great players on the contra-bass, on the horn, on the bassoon and other instruments which have since retired to the orchestra Even the 'cello is heard less in solo nowadays than it was twenty years ago, while the viola's place is exclusively in chamber and orchestral music. It may be that the democratization of music in the last hundred years has been in part responsible for the relegation of the more difficult instruments to the orchestra. Another reason may be the absence of a suitable repertoire. A composer will write music for the violin because he knows that he is writing for a great many violinists, but he might compose a piece for the double-bass only at the instigation of some master of the instrument like Koussevitzky. On the other hand, a man desiring to master an instrument will naturally favor the one which has the largest and best literature.

* * *

THE music that Mr. Koussevitzky played at his recital did not, it must be said, disclose matters which were significant in any sense, save that it gave the artist an opportunity to show us his complete command over his double-bass. To remedy the scanty repertoire Mr. Koussevitzky must have composed more for his instrument than the Concerto and the smaller piece he included in his program. Unfortunately the Concerto, which was expertly contrived for a double-bass, brought nothing more to the listener than well written passages and suave cantalina in the romantic vein of the year 1902, the date of its composition. It had, in fact, a strong resemblance to the E Minor violin concerto of Mr. Koussevitzky's countryman, Conus. But it would be unfair to expect a man to be a great instrumentalist, a great conductor and a great composer. I believe history records only two such paragons, Felix Mendelssohn and Serge Rachmaninoff.

* * *

CONSIDERING what he did with the uninspired music of his program last Tuesday, which he enhanced with a beautiful tone, matchless finger dexterity, polished phrasing and the emotional and intellectual sensibility of an experienced, thoughtful musician, all that Mr. Koussevitzky requires is a repertoire worthy of his extraordinary artistry. Perhaps if he were to give more concerts on the double-bass such a repertoire would come into being. Hearing him play no composer could resist the desire to intrust his best thoughts and emotions to the hitherto ludicrous double-bass.

* * *

ON his arrival in America about two weeks ago Mr. Fritz Kreisler told a reporter that creative musicians were pretty scarce at the present time and that in his opinion our own Messrs. Youmans and Gershwin were the exceptions. This dictum from so eminent a musician as Kreisler must have astonished our musical highbrows, especially with regard to Mr. Youmans who has never composed so much as a rhapsody. Mr. Gershwin has written both a rhapsody and a concerto and is therefore in a class a little higher than Mr. Youmans. But both boys are consistently guilty of producing musical comedies that prove enormously successful and make a great deal of money for them.

* * *

MR. KREISLER must have been pulling the reporter's leg, since he must know that no one who writes popular tunes, or even popular rhapsodies, can be a bona-fide, legitimate composer. How could he have said that creative musicians were scarce when the Philharmonic-Symphony and the Beethoven Symphony trot out a new work at every concert.

Is it possible that Mr. Kreisler prefers a good tune to a symphony or symphonic poem which our big orchestras deem good enough for performance?

* * *

IT is evident that the popular violinist is not acquainted with our critical attitude toward jazz boys like Gershwin and Youmans. The latter has as yet refrained from storming the legitimate concert halls, but the former enjoyed a meretricious success a few years ago with a piano concerto which Mr. Damrosch, in a magnanimous moment, accepted for performance by the New York Symphony Orchestra. At that time Mr. Gershwin was shown his place by the next morning's reviews. But recently Mr. Paul Whiteman gave another of his peculiar concerts which unaccountably sells out Carnegie Hall, when we were all dismayed to find Mr. Gershwin's old concerto, dressed up in jazz garments by Ferdie Grofe, the big feature of the evening.

* * *

THIS necessitated another critical spanking to the presumptuous composer of the "Man I Love" and other commercial tunes. In the morning and afternoon papers we reiterated our old opinion that Mr. Gershwin is unacquainted with the structure and form of a concerto as, indeed, how could he be? A few days later Dr. Zaslawsky, the eminent conductor of the Beethoven Symphony Orchestra, played for us a symphony by one who ought to know how to write one, since he is the head of a great American musical foundation. So Mr. Kreisler must be wrong.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
8 1928

Singers Coming Here Loudly Acclaimed in New York Concert

English Group Give Program of Folk-Songs Composed in Sixteenth Century, but Critic Promises No "Dry as Dust" Atmosphere in Any Selection.

By George Harris

The English Singers are coming to Richmond! All I can do is to burst out with the feeling that Richmond, musical and otherwise, ought to give them three loud cheers when they arrive here on Thursday. I heard them in New York last Sunday for the first time, and if I had gone up solely for their concert, up one night and back the next, I would have felt it more than worth while.

Except for the thirteenth century "rota"—"Summer is icumen in,"—and modern arrangements of English folk-songs, the music the English Singers perform was all composed between the years 1558 and 1695. This may sound as if their concerts had a dry-as-dust atmosphere, but if you could have heard the man next me in the audience last Sunday crying out "Oh, baby!" as the only adequate expression of his enthusiasm, you would realize that "dry-as-dust" is not the proper descriptive adjestice. They sing to packed houses, and at their performances there is an atmosphere of sincere and comfortable enjoyment such as one seldom finds in the jaded New York concert hall. I have heard of people going over and over again to hear the English Singers, which is unusual in America when there is no outstanding personality or famous name to mesmerize the herd.

There have been discovered recently in England quantities of madrigals and ballets (which we now call ballads) that were composed during the century before the birth of Back, and, although they were written in the classical style of what one calls strick counterpoint, is meaning that each voice is an semble must carry a distinct melod by itself as well as harmonize with the others voices, these easily English ompositions contain a spirit of gaiet and of beauty that seems unhinde d by the exacting rules under whi they were written.

It is said tha in the great manor-houses, when e table was cleared after dinner, the family and its guests would still sit the table and sing madrigals. The usic had been handed out to the , and each person would sing at sig t from a copy that contained his ow part only, like the separate violin oboe part in an orchestra today. These present-day English singers robably sing better than those avera e people did then, but they do not pretend to be great vocalists, and the sit around a table in the traditiona manner with the music before them and enter into the spirit of this Eliz bethan music-making with informal y and enthusiasm.

In the New Yo k papers the day after this concert that I have just heard the critics were overflowing with praise—all but on , who among other dissatisfactions fo nd one humorous song no better than modern vaudeville. But this critic has an unmistakeably Russian name, and probably has but little understanding of the subtleties of Anglo-Saxon humour. This concert which I heard in New York last Sunday makes me look forward with keen anticipation to this coming Thursday night, when I shall hear the English Singers again—this time in the Jefferson Auditorium.

Gives Unique Recital.

On Tuesday evening an unusual musical event took place in New York. It was a recital of music for the double-bass, or, as it is popularly called, the bass-viol. And the performer on this unwieldy and unattractive instrument was no less than Koussevitzky himself, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It seems that Koussevitzky is one of only three who have been virtuosi on the double-bass during its three hundred years' existence. It has always been sonsidered as the necessary backbone of the orchestra, but too cumbersome to play solos on. But in the latter part of the eighteenth century there appeared a man named Dragonetti—and I cannot help wondering if his name had anything to do with his being attracted to this howling instrument—who became a great double-bass virtuoso. Haydn and Beethoven heard him play and admired him exceedinly, and it is said that Beethoven never tired of hearing him play the 'cello parts of his string-quartets which he executed just as written with all the high notes, tI must not be forgotten that the double-bass is pitched exactly an octave lower than the 'cello, so that the difficulties would be almost as great as those of a performance on the 'cello of music written for the violin.

For his sole work Dragonetti used a bridge twice as high as was customary and unusually thick strings, and it is said that when others tried to play on Dragonetti's instrument blood actually spurted from their fingertips, so great was the pressure they had to bring to bear.

Bottesini was the second great master of the double-bass. He composed duets for double-bass and violin, and violinists such as Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski were proud to play in concert with him. These two performers used only three strings instead of four, and for their solo work tuned their instruments to a pitch slightly higher than that used in the orchestra. But Koussevitzky keeps the double-bass exactly as it is in the orchestra, resorting to no devices to make it more brilliant as a solo-instrument.

Both Bottesini and Koussevitzky took up the double-bass from necessity rather than from choice, each choosing it as the only available means of obtaining a scholarship in a musical conservatory, one in Milan and the other in Moscow. But Koussevitzky became enauoured of his instrument, and was famous in Berlin as a bass-viol virtuoso before he ever began to conduct orchestras. And so every now and again he puts down his baton and aims his bow at his first musical love.

New Season at "Met."

Tomorrow night the old yellow curtain of the Metropolitan Opera House rises for the first time since last April. The first offering is that poignant and surging work, "Le Maschere dei Tre Re," by Montemezzi, one of the most significant and individual operas since Wagner and Verdi. Rosa Ponselle sings the leading role, and, although I have not followed the cast of every performance at the Metropolitan, I think it is her first appearance there in that opera. Judging from the development in charm and personality that she showed last spring and from the undeviating beauty of her voice, her performance of Riora ought to be an inspiring one.

The next on the list is "Tannhauser," with Jeritza as Elizabeth. It is hoped that a vacation has sufficiently refreshed her voice to give it the beauty necessary to make interesting this rather ponderous music. On Thursday Grace Divine, a native of Cincinnati, who has appeared in concert in America, makes her bow at the Metropolitan, taking the second woman's part in Puccini's "Manon Lescaut."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

201

Boston Symphony Orchestra

On Tuesday evening, at 8.15 o'clock in Elmwood Music hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, 108 strong, with the illustrious Serge Koussevitsky conducting, will open the Buffalo Musical Foundation symphony series with the following program:

Classical Symphony, Op. 25....Prokofieff
Prelude—A l'Apres-midi d'un Faune —After the Eclogue of Stephane Mallarme .....Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from Daphnis et Chloe Ballet (Second Suite)...Ravel
Lever du Jour-Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 7 ..... Brahms

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the symphony. The character of the Brahms symphony has peaceful, tender, but not effeminate, serenity, which, on the one side, is quickened to joyous humor, and, on the other, is deepened to mediative seriousness.

Maurice Ravel, foremost of tone-painters in the contemporary French school, is thought by many to have achieved his masterpiece in Daphnis and Chloe. It is abundant in his characteristic delicacy. In sheer loveliness and grace certain woodwind passages in "dawn" and "pantomine" of this suite have, perhaps, been excelled by no other composer. This score is also said to be probably his largest canvas.

The Boston Symphony concert is the first of the series of seven programs this winter in Elmwood Music hall under Foundation auspices, being followed by the Philharmonic-Symphony with Mengelberg; the Detroit with Sir Thomas Beecham and the Victor Kolar conducting, the Cleveland with Nikolai Sokoloff conducting, the Prague Choir under the direction of Metod Dolezil.

The Buffalo Musical Foundation office in Denton, Cottier & Daniels announces that the season sale is still on in the box office of Denton, Cottier & Daniels, offering seven concerts for the price of six. The Boston Symphony tickets are also on sale in the box office.

* * *

NEW YORK WORLD

Horowitz Comes Here For Concert Friday

Vladimir Horowitz makes his first appearance in New York this year in a recital at Carnegie Hall on Friday night. The young Russian pianist's program opens with the "Appassionata" Sonata of Beethoven (F minor, op. 57). The second group is devoted to Brahms and includes three intermezzi (Op. 117, 118, 119) and the rhapsody (Op. 119). Chopin follows, represented by the F Minor Fantasy, two mazurkas and the Etude in C Minor (Op. 25). The last two numbers are the Schubert-Liszt "Liebesbotschaf" and the Liszt Rhapsodie Espagnole. Preceding his recital Mr. Horowitz will have played in the following cities: Mount Holyoke College, Oct. 12; Pittsburgh, Oct. 16; with the Detroit Symphony, Oct. 18 and 19; with the Boston Symphony, Oct. 21 and 23; with the Cincinnati Symphony, Oct. 24; Louisville, Oct. 25; Milwaukee, Oct. 29; St. Paul, Oct. 30.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first of a group of celebrated conductors to come to Pittsburgh this season, under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association. Friday night and Saturday afternoon he will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it will give the following programs: Friday — Stravinsky's Apollon Musagete, ballet; Debussy's Nocturnes; Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica." Saturday—Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25; Debussy's prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune; Ravel's orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe;" Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73.

Symphony Visit

FRIDAY—Serge Koussevitzky, with his Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the series of visiting orchestra concerts next Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Syria Mosque. Other orchestras to appear here this season include the New York Philharmonic for three visits, with Willem Mengelberg and Arturo Toscanini, conductors; the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, with Frederick Stock; the Cleveland, with Nikolai Sokoloff, and the Minneapolis, with Henri Verbrugghen.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAINDEALER

Gifted Boston Players to Be in Town Also

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

HOLD steady. The Bolsheviks are upon us. At any rate, Serge Prokokieff, Russian composer, whose "Classical" symphony is to be played this week in Masonic Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has always been reputed to be in sympathy with the Soviet regime—in sharp differentiation from his compatriot Rachmaninoff, high in the favor of the American public, whose allegiance to the Romanoff dynasty has never been questioned.

JULIA BUTLER SANKER PHOTO
JAMES H. ROGERS

Then, on the evening after the one marked by the performance indicated, we shall hear the Cleveland orchestra in some simon-pure music of the revolution: "March of the Orient," by a young Russian composer, Joseph Schillinger, who has been connected both with the Charkoff Music Institute and the Leningrad Institute of Art.

What puts the unmistakable stamp of the new order of things on his composition is the fact that it is issued by the Soviet government, which may be, one would guess, a pretty hard-boiled publisher. However, this sort of thing strikes me as quite peaceful penetration.

As for the youthful fire-eater Prokokieff, he has been much in the public eye for a number of years. He has visited America several times, if I mistake not. Once he was heard in Cleveland, as pianist and composer. He did not do anything horrific, even in the works of his own that he played.

I remember that he included in his program some Schubert music. That shows a mind not incapable of being attuned to the gentler phases of the art. And I understand that this "classical" symphony we are to hear springs from a like mood.

The program of the Boston Orchestra concert, which will be given in Masonic Hall on Wednesday evening, is uncommonly interesting and artfully varied. But after all, this occasion, anyway, it will be the conductor and the orchestra that will most engage the attention of the music lovers, who should most certainly be present en masse. For it will be a big night.

Russian Brings Orchestra Back.

Serge Koussevitzky, who has, almost needless to say, never appeared in Cleveland, has just entered upon his fifth season with the Boston Orchestra. This great organization, for many a year the American standard of orchestral perfection, fell upon unhappy days in war time and succeeding years. The deplorable Muck episode seemed to leave it high and dry.

Two capable men came, in successive terms of two or three years each, to conduct the once conquering Bostonians. But perhaps because of a lack of sympathy between leader and players, the orchestra entered upon what is known in baseball parlance as a slump. And presently found itself, to continue the analogy, in the second division. It really looked as though Bay State culture were due to receive a distressing jolt.

But along came the Russian Koussevitsky, and with his coming the sparks began to fly. The ancient glories were not only revived, they were lent added splendor. By all accounts Mr. Koussevitsky is the most stimulating, the most versatile and the most brilliant conductor the Boston Orchestra has ever possessed, even in its palmiest days. Olin Downes, the New York Times critic, ranks him with Stokowski and Toscanini as a "virtuoso" conductor.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

It is of interest to learn that Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston sympathony orchestra, is to give a recital this winter in Carnegie hall on the double bass fiddle. Mr. Koussevitsky is a remarkable performer on this, his chosen instrument, through it he won his way to fame in Europe many years ago, appearing with all the leading orchestras and commanding the unswerving support of all who heard his performance.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

In the World of Music

By Thos. Sparks

THE most interesting musical event of the week here was the recital given by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. Long before this distinguished musician entered the business of orchestral conducting he was known throughout Europe as a virtuoso performer on the double-bass; he was classed as one of the three greatest performers on this instrument the world has ever known.

Mr. Koussevitzky for many years startled the musical world abroad by his artistic playing upon an instrument not usually associated with solo performance, an instrument one thinks of as the backbone of orchestral structure. It is well known, of course, that for some years past Mr. Koussevitzky has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the time he has been associated with this great organization he has brought it back to the high standing it had for many years.

This recent appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky as a solo performer on the double-bass was at once of interest and attracted music lovers in great number to Carnegie Hall. Naturally, there was great curiosity to hear what this eminent musician and conductor could accomplish on this instrument.

USING an Amati double bass, which is smaller than ones seen in the usual orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky astounded his audience with a

That sounds alluring to the prospective listener.

Furthermore, the Boston Orchestra, now said to be in top form, has not played here in ten years. The reasons for hearing the following program seem to be abundant:

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25..Prokofieff
(a) Allegro
(b) Larghetto
(c) Gavotte
(d) Finale.
Prelude, A l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune ("The Afternoon of a Faun")..Debussy
Orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe".....Ravel
Ballet (second suite)
Lever du Jour, Pantomime, Danse Generale
Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73.....Brahms
(a) Allegro non troppo
(b) Adagio non troppo
(c) Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
(d) Allegro con spirito

Cleveland Orchestra Concerts.

One of the most memorable eve[nts] in the symphony concrts of last [sea]sons was the performance of Ern[est] Henri Bloch's "Schelomo" by the pr[in]cipal viola d' cellist of the Cleveland Or[ches]tra, pian- Victor de Gomez. A rich and [ex]ceptional work. Mr. de Gomez reve[aled] his own conself, even more than on an [ear]lier occasion, an interpreter, [a]lso. The recital technician, of singular [dis]tinction and unique musical minor concerto in thi[s] certs of the Clevelan[d] Masonic Hall, Thursd[ay] Friday afternoon.

He will play the S[aint-Saens] long time.

A feature of the [program] by reason of its j[uxtaposition] the Boston orchest[ra] preceding evening [in] the Brahms C m[inor] concluding numb[er] major symphony which Mr. Kous[sevitzky] his final item.

The luminous [quality] of the C min[or] known to all c[oncert] two works ar[e] symphonic m[asterpieces] between—or the old era.

The prog[ram] Overture, "[Leonore] ..... Symphony Orchestra, in Concerto ..... hth season and its fifth Op. 33 March of leadership of Serge Kous- Symphony as a busy schedule for ..... with its usual Symphony

Ch of twenty-four Friday aft-

The c[on]d Saturday evening pairs, the ope[ra] evenings and five Tuesday Music besides occasional pension Wade [Hall] Clevel[and] certs also in Symphony as pr[ivate] concerts in Sanders Theater, [Harvar]d University, Cambridge. The orchestra will also give single concerts at Smith, Wellesley and Yale.

During the first week in November the Boston Symphony will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on November 22-24, January 3-5, January 31-February 2, March 7-9 and April 11-13.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already introduced this season Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes," Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and a new partita by Michal Kondraczki, young Polish composer. Novelties to be offered include new symphonies by Prokokieff and Bohuslav Martinu and works by Aron Copland and Roger Sessions. A symphony by Frederick the Great is to have its American premiere, and special Schubert Centennial concerts are also announced.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky Opens Series Friday.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra association concert series in Syria mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon of this week.

Serge Koussevitzky is not only a famed conductor, but a talented player of the double-bass instrument. His mastery of the instrument brought him acclaim before his days of conducting. Since coming to America he has had many requests to give a recital on this instrument, and last Tuesday he finally acceded.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the first of the celebrated conductors to come to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association.

The Boston Symphony programs:

FRIDAY NIGHT.
AIpolon Musagete, Ballet ..... Stravinsky
Nocturnes .....Debussy
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" ...Wagner
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica" .....Beethoven

SATURDAY MATINEE.
"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25...Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (The Afternoon of a Faun) .Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" .....Ravel
Symphony No. 3 in D major, Op. 73.....Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON HERE TONIGHT

Rochester will have another musical opening at the Eastman tonight when Series B concerts are ushered in with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton. The [ad]vance sale of seats indicates another large and gala audience approaching in size the big outpouring of music lovers who heard Rosa Ponselle ten days ago.

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester tonight instead of the regular Friday concert date because its touring schedule made only a Monday date practicable. Rather than rob the music lovers of the community of the opportunity of hearing one of the world's greatest orchestras, the Eastman concert management changed the date for this occasion.

Motion picture performances will hold the screen this afternoon and will be resumed tomorrow, following tonight's concert interruption.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

202

MUSIC COMMENT

Boston Symphony to Open Pittsburgh Orchestra Association Season—Local Organization Plays Tonight—Other Activities in Offing.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL.
Press Music Critic.

INAUGURATING the thirteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will play in Syria mosque, Friday night, Nov. 2, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 3. This will mark the only appearance of the Boston organization during the present season, it is understood, but other offerings on the list, in that line, are on an equally high plane, that should mark the fall and winter series one long to be remembered, artistically and otherwise.

Three pairs of concerts will be given by the New York Philharmonic, with the dynamic Willem Mengelberg conducting the first two pairs, and Arturo Toscanini wielding the baton in the third set. Dates for the New York Philharmonic are Nov. 16-17, Jan. 11-12, and March 8-9. The Cleveland orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff, conducting, plays here Dec. 7-8, I am told, and the Minneapolis orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen, conductor, will be at the mosque Feb. 15-16.

Likely the most interesting event of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's present season will be the first appearance here in 15 years of the Chicago symphony, the date being Jan. 28, a red-letter day to be marked in your calendar. Frederick Stock, I believe, will conduct this concert. The Pittsburgh Orchestra association, of which Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president, has made it possible for students of music to hear these fine organizations for a very nominal outlay in the past, and this season it is continuing the policy that has been in force during former years. And in its existence the association certainly has brought to Pittsburgh the world's greatest orchestras, with complete personnel and a rather pretentious list of distinguished conductors.

• • •

By the way, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is gifted in another way aside from his genius in conducting. He is a soloist of high repute, his instrument being the cumbersome and much-maligned double bass. That man, according to all reports, is a virtuoso, with marvelous technic, and can accomplish about anything with this unwieldy "dog house" of an instrument as other artists can with the violoncello. Which brings to mind that the double bass as it now is has existed under its present form more than three centuries. History fails to record of more than a scant half dozen men who attained the rank of a virtuoso (in solo work) on the double bass, and of these perhaps the most famed include Koussevitzky himself, whom we will be privileged to see in the role of conductor once more, Friday and Saturday.

• • •

music of the American Negro, the symphony being the outgrowth of his researches in this fertile field.

Between Dvorak and Anton Seidl, then conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra, was a great bond of friendship. There is a story that at the final private rehearsal of the "New World" Seidl played each movement without a break, and that between the movements he left his desk and wended his way to the back part of the hall to exchange felicitations with the composer. The first public performance was given Friday afternoon, Dec. 15, 1893, at Carnegie hall, New York, which was crowded with enthusiastic admirers of the noted Bohemian. At the close of the "Largo," with its haunting English horn solo—the outpouring, evidently, of Dvorak's own homelonging—the great audience was so profoundly moved that in the boxes, filled with women of fashion, and all about the hall, people sat with the tears rolling down their cheeks. This same "Largo" will be played tonight, as it forms the second movement of the E minor.

• • •

POSSIBLY the most interesting interpretation I have heard of Enescoe's "Roumanian Rhapsody" No. 2 (the Symphony society plays the No. 1 tonight), was when the composer, Georges Enesco, came here with the Philadelphia ochestra, Jan. 12, 1923, as guest conductor and soloist. It was another of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's fine series of concerts. Mr. Enesco, no one disputed, gave his own composition, in which his country's folk-music was not forgotten, a virile reading, both that evening and the following afternoon, and on the same program played the Brahms concerto in D, for violin and orchestra, truly a

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Boston Symphony on Eastman Bill Tonight

Rochester will have another musical opening at the Eastman Theater tonight when Series B concerts are ushered in with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton. The [ad]vance sale of seats indicates another large audience approaching in size the big outpouring of music lovers who heard Rosa Ponselle ten days ago.

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester today instead of the regular Friday concert date because their touring schedule made only a Monday date practicable. Rather than rob the music lovers of the community of the opportunity of hearing one of the world's greatest orchestras the Eastman concert management changed the date for this occasion. Motion picture performances will hold the screen this afternoon and will be resumed tomorrow following tonight's concert interruption.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

WHEN KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE-BASS.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will play in Memorial hall Thursday evening, gave New York the surpise of its life Tuesday evening in Carnegie hall, when the celebrated master presented America its first double-bass viol concert.

Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times, expresses astonishment at Koussevitzky's mastery. In his review he says:

"Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics. . . . Mr. Koussevitzky was compelled to add to the program. The audience was loath to let him go. Those who have not heard him have probably little conception of what the double-bass can become in the hands of a master. In other hands, of course, it remains an element of instrumental ensembles. A man of genius last night gave it momentarily a great significance."

—VOTE YES AIRPORT—
VERNON Double Mil[l]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAINDEALER

Gifted Boston Players to Be in Town Also

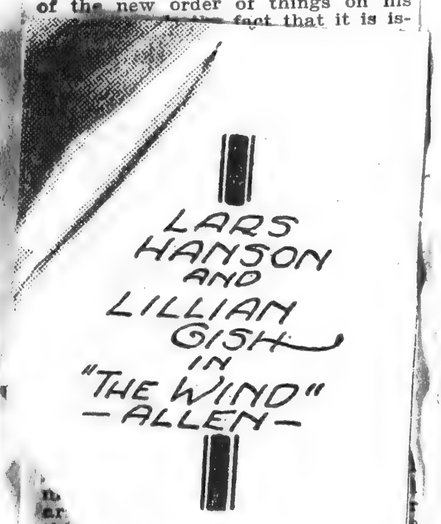
BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

HOLD steady. The Bolsheviks are upon us. At any rate, Serge Prokokieff, Russian composer, whose "Classical" symphony is to be played this week in Masonic Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, has always been reputed to be in sympathy with the Soviet regime—in sharp differentiation from his compatriot Rachmaninoff, high in the favor of the American public, whose allegiance to the Romanoff dynasty has never been questioned.

JULIA BUTLER SANKER, PHOTO.
JAMES H. ROGERS

Then, on the evening after the one marked by the performance indicated, we shall hear the Cleveland orchestra in some simon-pure music of the revolution: "March of the Orient," by a young Russian composer, Joseph Schillinger, who has been connected both with the Charkoff Music Institute and the Leningrad Institute of Art.

What puts the unmistakable stamp of the new order of things on his [illegible] fact that it is is-



[illegible] there is the only daughter, will be tall and lovely, with en- mond eyes, who is a stu- Russia. Cleveland School of Art. Serge [illegible] had an antique shop in most [illegible] ll summer, which she peared in [illegible] foster mother, Mrs. upon his [illegible] The first Mrs. Ball ton Orches[illegible]us music in the east tion, for ma[illegible]den name, Jessie standard of [illegible]e "How to Pray," upon unhappy finest hymnal ever succeeding [illegible]untry. Muck episode and dry.

Two capable [illegible] cessive terms of [illegible] ears each, to conduc[illegible] ring Bostonians. Bu[illegible] e of a lack of symp[illegible]der and players, th[illegible]ered upon what is kn[illegible] parlance as a slum[illegible]ently found itself, to co[illegible]logy, in the second d[illegible]eally looked as though [illegible]ulture were due to receive[illegible] jolt.

But along came t[illegible] Kous- sevitsky, and with [illegible] the sparks began to fly[illegible]. cient glories were not on[illegible] they were lent added s[illegible]y all accounts Mr. Kouss[illegible]s the most stimulating, th[illegible]rsatile and the most brillian[illegible]or the Boston Orchestra has[illegible]essed, even in its palmies[illegible] Olin Downes, the New Yo[illegible] critic, ranks him with Stok[illegible]d Tos- canini as a "virtuos[illegible]uctor.

VARI[illegible] VARIE[illegible]
WILLIAM "[illegible] BOYD in S FARRELL in "FAZIL" and SMART SET."
[illegible]lliard and Madison
IE DOVE in "CH."
RAWFORD DANCING TERS."
Farrell [illegible]a Nissen AZIL."
Tuesday [illegible]EN and [illegible]RRELL

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

It is of interest to learn that Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston sympathony orchestra, is to give a recital this winter in Carnegie hall on the double bass fiddle. Mr. Koussevitsky is a remarkable performer on this, his chosen instrument, through it he won his way to fame in Europe many years ago, appearing with all the leading orchestras and commanding the unswerving support of all who heard his performances.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

In the World of Music

By Ely Speaks

THE most interesting musical event of the week here was the recital given by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall. Long before this distinguished musician entered the business of orchestral conducting he was known throughout Europe as a virtuoso performer on the double-bass; he was classed as one of the three greatest performers on this instrument the world has ever known.

Mr. Koussevitzky for many years startled the musical world abroad by his artistic playing upon an instrument not usually associated with solo performance, an instrument one thinks of as the backbone of orchestral structure. It is well known, of course, that for some years past Mr. Koussevitzky has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the time he has been associated with this great organization he has brought it back to the high standing it had for many years.

This recent appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky as a solo performer on the double-bass was at once of interest and attracted music lovers in great number to Carnegie Hall. Naturally, there was great curiosity to hear what this eminent musician and conductor could accomplish on this instrument.

USING an Amati double bass, which is smaller than ones seen in the usual orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky astounded his audience with a remarkable performance; it is astonishing the remarkable effects Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from this ungainly instrument. He made of it a solo instrument quite as much as is the cello. Naturally, the literature for the double-bass is very limited.

OLEY SPEAKS.

The player, however, grouped together a program which held the interest of the audience at all times. He had the assistance of Henri Casadeus, player of the Viola d' amore, and Pierre Luboshutz, pianist. One of the numbers on the program was Koussevitzky's own concerto for double-bass. The recital was one of the most unique musical events heard here in a long time.

* * *

JOHN CHARLES THOMAS, the American baritone, fresh from [illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE

The Boston Symphony Starts 48th Season

In Fifth Year of Regime of Koussevitzky

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its forty-eighth season and its fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, has a busy schedule for 1928-'29, with its usual Symphony Hall series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pairs, five Monday evenings and five Tuesday afternoons, besides occasional pension fund concerts also in Symphony Hall and nine concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, Cambridge. The orchestra will also give single concerts at Smith, Wellesley and Yale.

During the first week in November the Boston Symphony will visit Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus and Pittsburgh. The usual five Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall and Friday evenings at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on November 22-24, January 3-5, January 31-February 2, March 7-9 and April 11-13.

Mr. Koussevitzky has already introduced this season Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes," Kodaly's "Hary Janos" suite and a new partita by Michal Kondraczki, young Polish composer. Novelties to be offered include new symphonies by Prokokieff and Bohuslav Martinu and works by Aron Copland and Roger Sessions. A symphony by Frederick the Great is to have its American premiere, and special Schubert Centennial concerts are also announced.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky Opens Series Friday.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony orchestra will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra association concert series in Syria mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon of this week.

Serge Koussevitzky is not only a famed conductor, but a talented player of the double-bass instrument. His mastery of the instrument brought him acclaim before his days of conducting. Since coming to America he has had many requests to give a recital on this instrument, and last Tuesday he finally acceded.

Mr. Koussevitzky is the first of the celebrated conductors to come to Pittsburgh under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association.

The Boston Symphony programs:

FRIDAY NIGHT.

Apolon Musagete, Ballet ..... Stravinsky
Nocturnes ..... Debussy
Prelude to "The Mastersingers" .. Wagner
Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica" ..... Beethoven

SATURDAY MATINEE.

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 ... Prokofieff
Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune (The Afternoon of a Faun) . Debussy
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ..... Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL

ORCHESTRA OF BOSTON HERE TONIGHT

Rochester will have another musical opening at the Eastman tonight when Series B concerts are ushered in with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton. The advance sale of seats indicates another large and gala audience approaching in size the big outpouring of music lovers who heard Rosa Ponselle ten days ago.

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester tonight instead of the regular Friday concert date because its touring schedule made only a Monday date practicable. Rather than rob the music lovers of the community of the opportunity of hearing one of the world's greatest orchestras, the Eastman concert management changed the date for this occasion.

Motion picture performances will hold the screen this afternoon and will be resumed tomorrow, following tonight's concert interruption.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

MUSIC COMMENT

Boston Symphony to Open Pittsburgh Orchestra Association Season—Local Organization Plays Tonight—Other Activities in Offing.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL.
Press Music Critic.

INAUGURATING the thirteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will play in Syria mosque, Friday night Nov. 2, and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 3. This will mark the only appearance of the Boston organization during the present season, it is understood, but other offerings on the list, in that line, are on an equally high plane, that should mark the fall and winter series one long to be remembered, artistically and otherwise.

Three pairs of concerts will be given by the New York Philharmonic, with the dynamic Willem Mengelberg conducting the first two pairs, and Arturo Toscanini wielding the baton in the third set. Dates for the New York Philharmonic are Nov. 16-17, Jan. 11-12, and March 8-9. The Cleveland orchestra, Nikolai Sokoloff, conducting, plays here Dec. 7-8, I am told, and the Minneapolis orchestra, Henri Verbrugghen, conductor, will be at the mosque Feb. 15-16.

Likely the most interesting event of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's present season will be the first appearance here in 15 years of the Chicago symphony, the date being Jan. 28, a red-letter day to be marked in your calendar. Frederick Stock, I believe, will conduct this concert. The Pittsburgh Orchestra association, of which Mrs. William Thaw, Jr., is president, has made it possible for students of music to hear these fine organizations for a very nominal outlay in the past, and this season it is continuing the policy that has been in force during former years. And in its existence the association certainly has brought to Pittsburgh the world's greatest orchestras, with complete personnel and a rather pretentious list of distinguished conductors.

* * *

By the way, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is gifted in another way aside from his genius in conducting. He is a soloist of high repute, his instrument being the cumbersome and much-maligned double bass. That man, according to all reports, is a virtuoso, with marvelous technic, and can accomplish about anything with this unwieldy "dog house" of an instrument as other artists can with the violoncello. Which brings to mind that the double bass as it now is has existed under its present form more than three centuries. History fails to record of more than a scant half dozen men who attained the rank of a virtuoso (in solo work) on the double bass, and of these perhaps the most famed include Koussevitzky himself, whom we will be privileged to see in the role of conductor once more, Friday and Saturday.

* * *

music of the American Negro, the symphony being the outgrowth of his researches in this fertile field.

Between Dvorak and Anton Seidl, then conductor of the Philharmonic orchestra, was a great bond of friendship. There is a story that at the final private rehearsal of the "New World" Seidl played each movement without a break, and that between the movements he left his desk and wended his way to the back part of the hall to exchange felicitations with the composer. The first public performance was given Friday afternoon, Dec. 15, 1893, at Carnegie hall, New York, which was crowded with enthusiastic admirers of the noted Bohemian. At the close of the "Largo," with its haunting English horn solo—the outpouring, evidently, of Dvorak's own homelonging—the great audience was so profoundly moved that in the boxes, filled with women of fashion, and all about the hall, people sat with the tears rolling down their cheeks. This same "Largo" will be played tonight, as it forms the second movement of the E minor.

* * *

POSSIBLY the most interesting interpretation I have heard of Enescoe's "Roumanian Rhapsody" No. 2 (the Symphony society plays the No. 1 tonight), was when the composer, Georges Enesco, came here with the Philadelphia ochestra, Jan. 12, 1923, as guest conductor and soloist. It was another of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's fine series of concerts. Mr. Enesco, no one disputed, gave his own composition, in which his country's folk-music was not forgotten, a virile reading, both that evening and the following afternoon, and on the same program played the Brahms concerto in D, for violin and orchestra, truly a

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat Chronicle

Boston Symphony on Eastman Bill Tonight

Rochester will have another musical opening at the Eastman Theater tonight when Series B concerts are ushered in with the appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its famous conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton. The advance sale of seats indicates another large audience approaching in size the big outpouring of music lovers who heard Rosa Ponselle ten days ago.

The Boston Symphony comes to Rochester today instead of the regular Friday concert date because their touring schedule made only a Monday date practicable. Rather than rob the music lovers of the community of the opportunity of hearing one of the world's greatest orchestras the Eastman concert management changed the date for this occasion. Motion picture performances will hold the screen this afternoon and will be resumed tomorrow following tonight's concert interruption.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

WHEN KOUSSEVITZKY PLAYS DOUBLE-BASS.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will play in Memorial hall Thursday evening, gave New York the surpise of its life Tuesday evening in Carnegie hall, when the celebrated master presented America its first double-bass viol concert.

Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times, expresses astonishment at Koussevitzky's mastery. In his review he says:

"Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics. . . . Mr. Koussevitzky was compelled to add to the program. The audience was loath to let him go. Those who have not heard him have probably little conception of what the double-bass can become in the hands of a master. In other hands, of course, it remains an element of instrumental ensembles. A man of genius last night gave it momentarily a great significance."

——VOTE YES AIRPORT——
VERNON [illegible]

203

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1928

TONE QUALITY OF SPMPHONY UNUSUAL

By WILLIAM P. COSTELLO

Last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its eminent leader, Serge Koussevitzky, played a concert in the Sastman which must have more than satisfied all the listeners, who just about filled the large auditorium.

W. P. COSTELLO

It was a concert which will be long remembered, and it proves well that a few years in back of an orchestra go a long ways towards mellowing the tone and in giving the members of it the ability to respond to every wish of their leader.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its forty-eighth season, and our own Philharmonic is only five years old. Therefore, we can hardly compare the two. The Boston musicians play with such a tone quality as we have seldom heard before in the playing of symphonic organizations.

The only other orchestra we have heard in the past few years that can be compared with the Boston Symphony is the New York Philharmonic, which also is scheduled to appear here this season.

QUIETLY EFFECTIVE

Mr. Koussevitzky is one of the most interesting leaders before the public. He leads his men in a quiet way, but nevertheless gets results. Some of the effects he achieved last night with an orchestra which numbers well over a hundred were astounding.

The program last night was in two divisions, the first of which consisted of music of the modern school, and the second half of it was composed of one symphony, Brahm's graceful No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73, which goes back many, many years.

Of the modern selections, two of the numbers came as new to most of the audience. They were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Opus 25, and Orchestral Excerpts fro mRavel's Balelt, "Daphne et Chloe." The third of the modern group was Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," which has been played by the Rochester Philharmonic.

Prokofieff had the idea in writing the "Classical" Symphony of writing something that a composer such as Mozart might write were he living today. He has been eminently successful in getting this into his score, and his "Classical" Symphony stands out as a gay and graceful bit of writing. It is in four short movements, full of melodious passages and beautifully orchestrated. We liked best of the four movements th esecond or Larghetto.

SURPRISES AUDIENCE

The Ravel ballet music, which was new to Rochester, came as a great surprise to the listeners. A good description of what Ravel meant to convey in it was given in the book of program notes. But no writing can convey all the beauty, the sheer melody and the wonderful ordchestration of the number. No wonder that the audience demanded Mr. Koussevitzky come back four or five times tc take bows.

He played the charming Debussy prelude beautifully. We are quite familiar with this number, but never before have we heard it played so well as Mr. Koussevitzky and his men played it last night.

But we liked his work in the Brahms symphony best of all. Certainly, Brahms had a great deal to say in his symphony, and he says it in such musical phrases that everybody can understand it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
JOURNAL
OCT 30 1928

THE CHAPERON'S COMMENT ON SOCIETY

Boston Symphony Concert Brings Throng of City's Elite to Eastman

By The Chaperon

The lure of a feast of superb music offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting brought the social world and music lovers in general out in the first snow storm of the season. Society hugged fur draps and velvet cloaks tightly about itself and sped quickly from its limousines to the warm foyer of the theater, where the cold blasts of an early winter did not penetrate.

It was a capacity audience which greeted this great musical organizatton and an audience quick to appreciate the mastery and power of a great conductor with enthusiastic and prolonged applause. It was an evening which strongly appealed to the older generation and it was noticeable that many of the white haired dowagers, soon to depart for Southern climes, were on hand to enjoy this offering.

It was undoubtedly due to the winter weather that so many of our fashionables donned velvet and heavy taffetas and crepes. Mr. and Mrs. John W. Force, who have recently returned from a motor trip, were in promenade last evening, Mrs. Force wearing a frock of rose colored moire with long, full skirt, following the latest of fashion's dictates, the uneven hemline.

MRS. J. FOSTER WARNER

There was also, in the Art Gallery promenade, Mrs. William E. Werner, in a somplay fashioned dinner frock of black lace. She was accompanied by Mrs. Charles W. Weis in a black velvet evening gown. Mr. and Mrs. Edward Peck Curtis were greeted by a host of friends as they passed the intermission in the gallery. Mrs. Curtis wore a frock of deep pink crepe. There also was to be seen Miss Mary C. Sage in a taffeta frock of rose and blue over which she wore an ermine coat, en promenade with Thaddeus Newell.

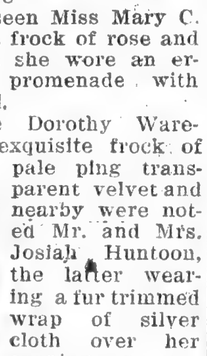
MRS. W. E. WERNER

Lovely blonde Dorothy Wareheim wore an exquisite frock of pale ping transparent velvet and nearby were noted Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Huntoon, the latter wearing a fur trimmed wrap of silver cloth over her evening gown. Miss Isabelle Buell, in a black velvet frock, was among the younger set present.

MRS. H. W. MORGAN

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Morgan, the latter in a gown of deep purple transparent velvet, joined a group of friends, as did also George Eastman and the Rev. and Mrs. George E. Norton.

Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Kirk Knowlton were among those who chose to leave their seats during the intermission for a short tour of the theater and following their example were also Mr. and Mrs. Wendell Curtis, the latter looking very smart in a gown of delft blue and silver georgette; Miss Henrietta Rhees, who wore a gown of pale blue georgette, Miss Henrietta Rhees, who wore a gown of pale blue georgette, over which she later placd her wrap of green velvet, and Mrs. James Howard Kidd Jr., whose gown of black velvet was covered by a wrap of midnight blue velvet, with large roll collar of self material.



MISS H. RHEES

Among the early arrivals at the theater were Mrs. Gordon C. Baird, her gold wrap trimmed with a large collar of white fur, and Miss Marietta Dryer, who kept her fur trimmed wrap of green velvet snugly about her. Mrs. Leon D. Lewis, in a gown of black lace, followed closely after accompanied by her daughter, Miss Janet Lewis, in a frock of taffeta in two tones of blue.

MISS M. DRYER

Mr. and Mrs. Bernard Dunn, the latter in brown lace, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur See, Dr. and Mrs. J. Craig Potter, Mrs. Frank S. Bidwell, accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Charles Challice, were also present, as were also Mr. and Mrs. J. Clifford Kalbfleisch, and their son in law and daughter, Dr. and Mrs. Clarence P. Thomas, Mrs. F. Harper Sibley, Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Allen Stebbins, Professor Clarence King Moore, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wright Dodge.

Mrs. Edward S. Ellwanger, Miss Helen Ellwanger, Miss Sarah Creswell, Miss Louise Devine, Miss Miss Adelaide Devine, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wright Dodge, Miss Annette Munro, Dr. Charles Hoeing, Mrs. John J. Finucane, Mr. and Mrs. Meyer Jacobstein, were among those present.

Also noted during the evening were: Mr. and Mrs. Gilman Perkins, Dr. and Mrs. John Aikman, Dr. and Mrs. Herbert Brown, Dr. Harvey J. Burkhart, Dr. and Mrs. Rush Rhees, Mrs. J. DeWitt Butts, Miss Laura Hawkes, Mr. and Mrs. Buell P. Mills, Augustine Cunningham, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Beckley, Dr. and Mrs. George Whipple, Miss Marion Weed, Mrs. J. Foster Warner, Mr. and Mrs. James F. Barker.

MISS MARY SAGE

MRS. FRANCIS BOTTOME

Miss Eva Howe, Mr. and Mrs. Morton Baum, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Bottome, Mr. and Mrs. Warren Gehrken, Isaac Adler, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Meulendyke, Harold Gleason and Mrs. William Craig.

* * *

MISS DOROTHY WAREHEIM, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Harry Wareheim of Oxford Street, who was one of the several attractive members of society to attend the concert last evening at the Eastma nTheater.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
Dispatch
OCT 30 1928

Fact and Figure of the Boston Symphony

Here are some facts about the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear in concert at Memorial hall, Thursday at 8:15 p. m.:

Contains 110 musicians.

In its 48th season.

Koussevitzky's first appearance in Columbus.

Boston's first in 16 years.

Rated as one of the greatest symphony orchestras and conductors in America.

Will visit only five cities outside of Boston and New York this season.

Columbus is one of the five.

Two symphonies on program never played in Columbus before.

Will arrive in Columbus, Thursday noon, from Cleveland.

Tickets for Boston concert go on sale, Wednesday morning, at Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

Season tickets for Boston, Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts now on sale.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
OCT 30 1928

Mr. Koussevitzky to Be Honor Guest at Reception

AFTER the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Thursday night, in Memorial hall, Mr. and Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington will entertain at their home, 292 South Columbia avenue, in honor of the conductor, Mr. Serge Koussevitzky. They have invited the guarantors of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, their wives and husbands, members of the executive committee and their husbands, and chairmen of divisions and their husbands.

Other guests will be Mr. R. Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra; Mr. J. Bedetti, cello; Mr. J. LeFranc, viola; Mr. G. Laurent, flute; Mr. F. Gillet, oboe and Mr G. Boetcher, horn. All are first chair men in the orchestra.

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
OCT 30 1928

One thing about the Boston Symphony Orchestra must be good. With Serge Kussevitzky conducting it can make more noise than ten jazz orchestras and do it more artistically. Herr Kussevitzky believes it is a conductor's bounden duty to try out the modern horror music regardless of how it affects an audience, and has given notice he doesn't intend to stand still in this world. That shouldn't bother his musicians, however, as sour note sound exactly like the others.

25 Years Ago Today

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 30 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS CONCERT SERIES TUESDAY

Serge Koussevitzky will lead his celebrated Boston Symphony orchestra in the program to be presented Tuesday evening in Elmwood Music hall at 8:15 o'clock, opening the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical foundation.

The Boston orchestra, richly endowed by music lovers of that city anxious for it to maintain the high standard it reached under Dr. Karl Muck as conductor, is rated by music critics as among the few superlative orchestras of the world. Koussevitzky, a Russian and a double bass viol virtuoso before he became a conductor, is given much of the credit for the organization's reputation.

Boston Symphony Plays First Concert in Eastman Series B

By STEWART B. SABIN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitski, gave last evening the first of the Eastman Theater Series B concerts. The program consisted of Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, three movements, and Brahms' Second Symphony.

It was a program that at casual glance looked to be decidedly modern in slant in its first section, with a Brahms finale to tilt it back toward older music—all the more this impression because two of the first three numbers had not previously been played in Rochester. As an experience, it proved a program that had balance and proportion, if it lacked, in one particular, contrast.

Prokofieff is a most versatile personage among the present-day composers; he can be as declamatory and vociferous as any, and is on occasion. But his classical symphony proves that he can be in spirit and expression direct, clear, charming and consistent in mood with the title he chose for this composition. It is not a symphony large lines; if its extension reat, its ideas are e expressed elabor-tor's notion of that thought clearly given. The result was a performthat was exceedingly lovely much of the time, but which made seem to the writer that Brahms "loafed" in this symphony more than in his others; that there are a goodly number of passages in this score which are plain writing against space, not adding to the musical message.

The Boston Symphony seemed to the writer to be as worthy of encomium as ever it was. It gave a performance leaving the hearer satisfied with its technical and tonal excellence. The audience of the evening seemed to indicate this satisfaction by its reception of the conductor and players.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

OCT 3 0

OPEN SYMPHONY SERIES

Koussevitzky and orchestra to give concert tonight

With very few changes in its personnel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with its leader, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at Elmwood Music hall this evening at 8.15 o'clock, playing the first program in the symphony series of the Buffalo Musical Foundation.

The orchestra has acquired a new virtuoso at the head of its horn section since its appearance here last year. He is Georg Boettcher, who has had a notable career as horn soloist of the Breslau Royal Opera theater, the Dortmund Symphony orchestra and in the Berlin Royal Opera orchestra, having been in the last position for sixteen years. Other new members are in the 'cello, violin and percussion sections. Bernard Zighera, familiar as pianist of the orchestra last season and as second harp, now takes his place as first harp.

Mr. Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who is responsible, according to critics, for bringing the orchestra to the finest pitch of its career, is said to be unique among conductors not only in his choice of programs but in his instinctive method. He seems to be aware only of the opportunity which his post gives him of enjoying great sound. While some conductors are said to be to their men a moving hand and others, a seeing eye, Mr. Koussevitzky is said to be a listening ear an ear that is sensitive to the charm of the instrumental sonorities, rather than merely keen to detect a false note. He takes deep personal pleasure in every concert his orchestra gives. His concert this evening has been carefully planned to give conservative and modern tastes each their full share of enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

OCT 3 0

* * *

THE Boston Symphony orchestra will give its only concert of the season in Cleveland, and the first in ten years, at Masonic hall Wednesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated Russian conductor, will be at the desk.

The Cleveland orchestra gives its regular pair of concerts at Masonic hall Thursday evening and Friday afternoon. Victor de Gomez, leading cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

* * *

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 3 1 1928

MUSIC World Leader in Columbus Thursday

SERGE KOUSSEVITZSKY.

SYMPHONY BRINGS IN 110 MUSICIANS

First Concert of Boston Orchestra Here Since Two Years Before War.

One of the greatest personalities in the music world today will come to Columbus Thursday to direct the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Memorial Hall.

Serge Koussevitzsky, a Russian nobleman with the appearance and manner of a statesman, has for four years successfully led the greatest orchestra in America. Without the long hair and the usual flourishes which mark the efforts of many of his contemporaries, Koussevitzsky, critics say, commands the mammoth 110-piece organization as if it were a single instrument, and he the artist.

Koussevitzsky is the champion of young composers, the "enfants terrible" whose modern music frequently startles and outrages the conservative ears of concert-goers. He believes in them, publishes their work, and when it is worthy, introduces it himself.

Last summer he conducted his annual "Concerts Koussevitzsky" in Paris, where he introduced 13 works to the Parisian public. One of these was Carpenter's "Skyscrapers."

When he returned from Europe, packed in his trunk were new symphonies by the youthful Prokofieff, Martinu, Copeland and Sessions. Some of these will have their first public hearings this season.

Stravinsky, now firmly entrenched in the favor of music lovers here and in Europe, was discovered by Koussevitzsky, who still publishes his works.

With the orchestra will be a stranger, Georg Boettcher, from Berlin, French horn virtuso, persuaded into the ranks of the American orchestra by Koussevitzsky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its last appearance in Columbus two years before the world war, when the organization boasted only 80 members. Since then its growing popularity has held it in the east, where it plays before packed houses in its own Symphony Hall, Boston.

COLUMBUS, OHIO

OCT 3 1

Boston Orchestra Is Coming for Concert

First Appearance of Symphony Group in City for 16 Years.

Columbus will be host, Thursday, to the Boston Symphony orchestra and its conductor, Serge Koussevitsky, whom critics hold to be one of the greatest personalities in the world today as leader of the finest symphony organization in America.

The orchestra, including 110 musicians, will arrive at the Union station by special train from Cleveland for a concert in Memorial hall at 8:15. At Cleveland the Boston will give a concert in Masonic hall and from Columbus the famous band will journey to Pittsburgh for a two-day stand in Pittsburgh.

Columbus is only one out of five cities in the United State outside of Boston and New York which will be honored with a visit by the Boston orchestra this season. Other cities on the week's tour are Buffalo and Rochester.

FIRST IN 16 YEARS

Included in the special train is a baggage coach entirely filled with precious instruments worth thousands of dollars. This coach is in charge of a special baggage master.

The visit to Columbus by the Boston orchestra is the first in 16 years, the celebrated Carl Muck being conductor of the orchestra on the last occasion. Koussevitzky will give his premier performance in Columbus.

This celebrated conductor rose to fame via the double bass, or commonly known "bull fiddle." He began his career as a musician on this pachyderm of the species of violins at the age of 14 in Moscow. A week ago Koussevitzky gave to America its first concert on the double bass. He is the only concert soloist on that instrument in the world.

CHAMPIONS MODERNS

Koussevitzky, a Russian nobleman, owned his own orchestra and publishing house in Moscow prior to the revolution and he lost everything in the ensuing turmoil.

For his Columbus program, Koussevitzky has selected two symphonies which have never been played in central Ohio. He is the champion of the modern composer, having introduced 13 new works in Paris during the past summer, one of them being the American composer Carpenter's "Skyscrapers."

Koussevitzky according to those who have seen him in action, commands the mammoth 100-piece orchestra as if it were a single instrument and he the artist.

The concert is under the auspices of the Symphony club of central Ohio, of which Mrs. B. Gwynne Huntington, 292 South Columbia avenue, is president. Proceeds of the Boston concert, as well as those by the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit, also on the club's series, will be applied to a scholarship fund to provide a musical education for talented children unable to acquire it themselves.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 3 1

204

Boston Symphony

Orchestra, Under Koussevitzky, Opens Foundation's Season Here in Notable Performance

By EDWARD DURNEY

Serge Koussevitzky, distinguished Russian, who has been guiding the destinies of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past four seasons, returned with the Boston aggregation and gave the opening program of the Buffalo Musical foundation's season orchestra series Tuesday evening, in Elmwood Music hall. Each year Mr. Koussevitzky presents his organization to us in such rarely perfect form that the concert goer now takes for granted the superb performance that unfailingly comes to pass. It would be difficult to conceive of a more artistically significant opening to the series than Tuesday evening's concert. The talented Koussevitzky presented an absorbing program, and both conductor and players must have experienced gratification at the response of the large, appreciative audience.

Koussevitzky seems to electrify his players quite as much as he does his hearers; the music he reads takes on life and its every beauty is enhanced. True, the Russian is an individual, and for this the listener must need give thanks, for the undeniable Koussevitzky touches bestowed upon an interpretation are authoritative and always artistic.

He began his program with the "Classical" symphony of the modern, Prokofieff. In this work the composer is said to have attempted to write a modern score in classic form. Whether he has succeeded fully may be a matter for question. Certainly he has written an engaging work; one which betrays little of modern tendency, but which imitates frankly an earlier style, or better, earlier styles; a work revealing itself as a composite whole but remaining, nevertheless, an imitation. The four movements of the Prokofieff opus are of cheerful mood, and the spirit of the music was communicated faithfully in the admirable performance of the Boston forces.

The French creators, Debussy and Ravel, followed, the former represented by his "Prelude a l'Apres-midi d'un Faune." This exquisitely poetic work was read with rare finesse and with the keenest appreciation of its impressionistic significance. Each instrumental solo voice was a thing of beauty and the whole orchestral utterance was pleasing. The listener constantly was aware of the delicately lined pictures of soft hues, of the fragrance of nature, the light and shade of the wood. It was an interpretation of the Debussy work destined to linger in the memory.

The Ravel excerpts were from the composer's second "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet suite, music fully attesting the Ravel creative talent. The composer here is eloquently descriptive, his score is glamorous and he writes to a tremendous climax at the finale of the Danse Generale. The presentation of the Ravel music left nothing to be desired.

The evening's formal symphony was the Brahms, No. 2, D Major. This offering made up the second half of the program and its four movements, of pervading loveliness, so beguiled the listener that the performance seemed to occupy but a moment. In this symphony Brahms gives us a wealth of melody and his varied and detailed treatment of his material charges the work with that indispensable quality, interest. In spite of its more than considerable evidence of workmanship the idea of simplicity holds sway in this work, and portions of it, the Allegretto in particular, are of pastoral fragrance.

It seems almost needless to mention the Koussevitzky performance. It was eminently skilful, musicianly, and the effect was charming from beginning to end. Again the orchestra was the master's pliable instrument; his medium for the authentic communication of the music's message.

The tribute of prolonged, enthusiastic applause was the reward of the conductor and his players at the close of the symphony, as it had been after each performance of the evening. The gracious leader shared honors with his men.

Chamber Music Concert.

A group of Boston Symphony orchestra members, the Chamber Music society, gave a delightful program Tuesday afternoon, in the auditorium of Mt. St. Joseph academy. The full ensemble numbered nine instruments, strings, woodwinds and piano, and pleasantly remembered from last season were George Laurent, flutist, whom one is tempted to pronounce incomparable; Paul Mimart, clarinetist; Raymond Allard, bassoon player, and Bernard Zighera, pianist.

Music for the full ensemble and for different ensemble combinations made up a program of variety and great interest. The entire body of players gave the four numbers of a ballet suite, Gluck-Motti; a Bach English suite prelude and the Schubert "Marche Militaire." A Beethoven suite for flute, violin and viola, a Mozart quintet movement for clarinet and strings, two movements of the Borodin String quartet, in D, and a Loeillet Sonata, for flute, oboe and piano, completed the list. The entire performance was of high musical caliber, was thoroughly artistic, and both as individuals and as a group the men distinguished themselves and won the enthusiastic plaudits of an audience which packed the auditorium.

Musical treats of the kind are all too rare. Tuesday afternoon's event provided opportunity for a hearing of music not included in the average program, and, too, for an advantageous hearing of several of the instruments as played by experts.

The concert was under the auspices of the music department of the academy.

Among those in the audience at the orchestra concert were Mrs. Thomas F. Cooke wearing a black velvet evening wrap and Mrs. Bradley Gaylord in black velvet gown with evening wrap to match with white fox collar and cuffs. Mrs. Frederick G. Crane of Dalton, Mass., was with Miss Marion Himmelsbach, the former in a white chiffon gown, the latter in cherry red georgette. Mrs. Charles L. Gurney was with her son, Charles. She wore a green gown. Mr. and Mrs. Frank H. Potter Jr. attended, the latter in a beige lace gown with coral sash and slippers.

Others noticed were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Donner, Dr. and Mrs. John G. Stowe, Mr. and Mrs. Arnold B. Watson, Mrs. E. G. Spaulding and her mother, Mrs. W. Caryl Ely of New York, Dr. James W. Putnam, Roger Putnam, Miss Harriet Keating, Miss Ruth Bryant, Mrs. George Bleistein, Mrs. George Bleistein Jr., Robert E. Leake, Miss Gertrude Smith, Mrs. George I. Seney, Dr. Howard Osgood, Mrs. Howard Osgood, Mrs. Lewis J. Surdam, Mrs. Daniel Strickland, Jack Strickland, Mrs. William A. Griffin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Sprague, Roswell Park, Dean and Mrs. Julian Park, Mrs. Frank F. Henry, Mrs. George Dudley Enos, Mrs. Frank F. Spitzmiller and Mrs. Rogers N. Armstrong.

Mrs. Robert L. Gallagher, Miss Martha Gallagher, Mr. and Mrs. Howard Morey, Miss Betty Welch, Mrs. Stephen M. Clement, Mrs. Charles Frost, William A. Ramsdell, Mrs. A. J. Elias, Miss Maud Wolf, Mr. and Mrs. Everett Jameson, Mrs. Alfred H. Schoellkopf, Harold W. Hunsicker, Mrs. Dexter P. Rumsey, Mrs. William C. Warren, Mr. and Mrs. Robert P. Keating, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Gratwick, Mr. and Mrs. George B. Mathews.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 3 1 1928

SYMPHONY COMING

Boston Orchestra to Appear Thursday at Memorial Hall.

The Symphony Club of Central Ohio begins its season of concerts Thursday night when the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the renowned Russian, Serge Koussevitzsky, directing, will present a program in Memorial Hall.

The Boston Symphony comprises 110 musicians. At the orchestra's last appearance in Columbus, several years before the World War, there were only 80 members.

The program will include "Classical Symphony" by the modern composer, Serge Prokofieff, and orchestral exerpts from "Daphnie and Chloe" by the French modernist, Maurice Ravel.

The last half of the program will be given over to the "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73," by Brahms.

205

The Concert REVIEWED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the Eastman Theater

ROCHESTER TIMES-UNION Oct 30

By A. J. WARNER

The Program

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 ..... Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale
Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme
Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet ..... Ravel
(Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, paid one of its all too infrequent visits to Rochester last night and gave a concert of memorable beauty in the Eastman Theater before a large and rapturous audience. Under the baton of a musician who has been wisely characterized as challenging, provocative and alive, New England's venerable and distinguished band has assumed a new and quickening splendor which has made its performances a synonym for orchestral "Eventfulness."

The conductorial qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky do not lend themselves readily to definition. They are by no means of a sort that calls forth unanimous approbation, especially among reactionary music lovers, and much has been said and written concerning his manner of dealing with the classics. Yet boredom takes flight at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts and the magic of an amazingly arresting personality ensnares his listeners. He has a complete faith, so it seems, in his own interpretive point of view and he proceeds to proclaim it with an irresistible intensity.

The assertion of those who hail him as a sensationalist is difficult, I have always felt, to credit. Rather is he a master of communicative individualism, passionately eager to convey, through the medium of his players what he is sure each composer means to say. Mr. Koussevitzky is almost invariably interesting and his orchestra—generally acknowledged to be one of the three or four greatest in the world—leaves behind it these days what Mr. W. J. Henderson has referred to as a resplendent trail of glory. Certainly last night's concert was a magnificent revelation of the present high attainments of the Boston Symphony in regard to technical proficiency—as an instrument whose various choirs sing as a single celestial voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for choosing engrossing and harmonious programs. On this occasion he began with the "Classical" Symphony, op. 25, of Serge Prokefieff, the modern Russian, whose works he has so often elected to play for his Boston public. It was given a performance that was as transparent and spirited as the music is humorcus, innocuous and facile. Nowhere to be found were the raucous and bizarre characteristics of the Prokofieff of the ballet "Chout" or the "Scythian Suite," and in their stead is an attempt—according to Felix Borowski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago Orchestra — "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But, as Olin Downes has remarked, it would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. To imitate the Mozartian idiom is indeed a rather "tall order." Mr. Prokofieff has, however, contrived some entirely agreeable music that is melodious and easy to hear. "Ersatz Mozart," Lawrence Gilman called it.

Debussy's masterwork in the realm of impressionism, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," came next on the program and was played in superlative fashion—with the excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, which reveal so bewilderingly the composer's necromancy in the realm of instrumentation. His score is a kaleidoscope of multi-colored sonorities and its performance last evening was an enchanting experience for the collective ear of the audience. One could only exclaim in wonder: "What an orchestra!"

The concert was brought to a close with Brahms' second symphony in D major op. 73 whose tenderness and serenity were exquisitely unfolded by a conductor who, though not controlled by tradition, never sacrificed the grace and beauty of the music to a desire to depart from the interpretive path of custom. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were accorded an ovation at the end of the program.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

OCT 1 1928

Boston Symphony

Four new musicians were introduced at the opening rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Serge Koussevitsky, then first assembling his orchestra, presented to them Georg Boettcher, the illustrious French horn virtuoso of Berlin, who has come from Europe to head the horn section.

Mr. Boettcher, born in Berlin in 1885, has had a notable career as solo horn of the Breslau Staat Teater, the Dortmund Symphony Orchestra, and in the Berlin Royald Opera Orchestra. He has held this position for the last 16 years, thus playing under all the foremost conductors of Central Europe.

The other new members are Y. Chardon, 'cello, N. Lauga, violin, and L. White, percussion. Two musicians returning after a year's absence are M. Lafosse, trumpet, and E. Coughey, second harp. Bernard Zighera, familiar as pianist of the orchestra last season and as second harpist now takes his place as first harpist.

The orchestra will appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater February 3. Reservations may be made by phone, 2-2251, or by mail direct to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street, care of McCoy's, Inc.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

OCT 3 1 1928

Symphony Concert

Among the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were to occupy boxes at Wednesday evening's concert at Masonic Auditorium are:

Mr. and Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Adelia Prentiss Huges, Mr. Nikolai Sokoloff, Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Bulkley, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln G. Dickey, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Halle, Mrs. Leonard C. Hanna, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Eaton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dittmar, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Feather, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Hiss, Mr. David P. Hyman, Mr. George Clark Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry D. Norvell, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Smith, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Stephan, Mrs. J. Tracy and Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Wall.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestral Association concerts in Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" ballet. On Saturday afternoon, the principal work is Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major. Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and Ravel's orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL

OCT 3 1 1928

luncheon at her home Wednesday.

* * *

MR. AND MRS. B. GWYNN HUNTINGTON will entertain at their home, 292 S. Columbia Ave., following the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, honoring the conductor, Mr. Serge Koussevitzsky. Guests will be guarantors of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, their wives and husbands, members of the executive committee and their husbands, chairmen of divisions and their husbands; Mr. R. Burgin, concert master of the orchestra; Mr. J. Bedetti, cello; Mr. J. LeFranc, viola; Mr. G. Laurent, flute; Mr. F. Gillet, oboe, and Mr. G. Boetcher, horn.

* * *

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES

OCT 3 1 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Lead by Koussevitzky Heard In Modern Classic Program

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall last evening under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, reached a point of perfection that left a large and brilliant audience unable to express its satisfaction in mere applause. Fortunately, there were music-lovers present to whom the sheer beauty of the entire presentation appealed so powerfully that they were content to sit in absolute silence, wrapped around with gorgeous harmony. No higher tribute could be paid Serge Koussevitzky and his band of musicians than the little breath of ecstasy that seemed to come from every listener at the close of each number. Sometimes it was a happy sigh, sometimes a delighted exclamation, sometimes a contented silence, but always sympathy and deep feeling.

Several engrossing features marked this first of the symphony concerts of Marian de Forest's series. One was the choice of an unusual and fascinating program; the second, Serge Koussevitzky's masterly phrasing, and third, the eloquent and impressive reading of Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The program opened with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the four movements, all very short, played with delicacy of tone and ease of execution that the Boston organization seems to achieve beyond all others. The leader's natural, simple way of conducting his band was as effective and striking as ever; and those delights which hearers enjoyed in the past from his intensive and delicate interpretation and the carefully-tutored response of his orchestra were in full evidence last evening. The tuneful lines of his readings sang with rich beauty; and not an opportunity for dramatic eloquence and contrast of mood but was seized with complete effect. But always his quiet taste and dignified scholarship were a restraining, artistic influence; the climax was reached in every case by way of exquisite tone and crescendo of deep feeling rather than by means of volume or speed. In fact one wondered were there any cymbals in the band, they were so conspicuously absent for a time, but when they did come, one learned just how fine could be their restrained effect. The Brahms Symphony had a superb hearing; the strings in perfect ensemble, the lighter passages done with fine, furtive skill, the climaxes full and inspiring. The four movements beautifully co-ordinated and worked into one poetic whole ended in a wonder of orchestral power, which brought the audience to its feet in spontanecus appreciation.

Especially appealing was the work of the flute, oboe, clarinet and harp, in the second number of the program, "The Afternoon of the Faun," a tone picture rich in instrumentation and beauty of feeling. The thing was made lyric with the rapture of emotion, harmony and imagination.

Orchestral's fragments from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe made a lovely bit of modern tone poetry, the occasional drama worked into a song of rare texture, wonderful transitions of mood and skillful balance of effects. As played last night this work goes on record as one of the orchestra's most delightful numbers. It is the miming of the story of Pan and Syrinx; Chloe, impersonating the young nymph, with whom Pan falls in love. She does not respond but runs to hide until recalled by the witching notes of the lover's improvised flute. She dances to his music, her companions appear and the piece ends in a glorious burst of joyous tumult, the general dance.

It was here that the orchestra proved that the beauty of tone for which it is famous is never sacrificed for volume. This final movement ending in tremendous strength maintained all the liquid purity of tone and fine shading of the most delicate passages.—M. W.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS

OCT 3 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Will Present Programs in Mosque Friday and Saturday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra association concerts at Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica", Wagner's prelude to "The Master-singers of Nuremburg", Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes", and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" ballet. On Saturday, the principal work is Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, "The Afternoon of a Faun", by Debussy, and Ravel's Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 3 1 1928

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last Sunday started out on its first long tour of the season, so that there will be no symphony concerts in Boston this week. The orchestra was heard in Rochester, N. Y., on Monday, played in Buffalo on Tuesday and tonight will give a program in Cleveland, a new place on its musical journeyings. Concerts in Columbus tomorrow and in Pittsburgh on Friday and Saturday will complete the week's trip. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the two concerts in Boston next week and the program will include the Third Symphony of Sibelius, to be heard for the first times there. November 18 will come a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Jeannette Vreeland, well known in Lowell, will be one of the soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH

OCT 3 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS HERE FRIDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, under the distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon this week. The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet. On Saturday afternoon the principal work is Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 3 1 1928

SYMPHONY ARRIVES HERE ON THURSDAY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Columbus Thursday at 1 p. m. in a special train from Cleveland for its concert in Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m.

One baggage coach in the special will be entirely filled with instruments of the orchestra.

While in Columbus, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the Boston Orchestra, and the management will be guests at the Deshler-Wallick Hotel. After the Columbus concert, its first in 16 years, the Boston band will go to Pittsburgh for a two-day engagement, Friday and Saturday.

Tickets for the Boston concert went on sale Wednesday at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

BOSTON BAND COMES FROM CLEVELAND

Preparations are being made to receive the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will arrive in Columbus, Thursday, at 1 p. m., by special train, for its concert in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m. The orchestra and its heavy baggage will arrive from Cleveland, where a concert is scheduled in Masonic hall, Wednesday evening.

While in Columbus, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the orchestra, and its management, will be guests of the Deshler Wallick hotel.

Tickets for the Boston concert went on sale, Wednesday morning, at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Season tickets for the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts also are available.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF EXTRAS

POST Nov 13

Monday Audience Listens to Stravinsky's Gentle Ballet

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening saw the first of the season's extra Symphony Concerts, which, as in past seasons, are to fall five on Monday evenings, five on Tuesday afternoons. The capacity audience was but to be expected, and the same comment might be made concerning its air of enthusiasm. The subscribers to these extra series have no cause to be sated with symphonic music, and in preparing his programmes for them Mr. Koussevitzky avoids compositions that through strangeness of idiom or extreme complexity might prove difficult of ready comprehension.

SCHUMANN'S FIRST

To be sure, the concert of last evening afforded one of the season's novelties, Stravinsky's music to his ballet "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." But this "Apollo Musagetes" reveals a Stravinsky wholly different from the author of the "Sacre du Printemps" or even of "Petrushka." In this, his latest music to be heard in America, Stravinsky has courted and captured classic simplicities. A gentle music, for the most part, is this; at times sweetly melancholy, and at times verging close to the more obvious type of ballet-music.

For the rest there came last evening only accepted masterpieces: Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Schumann's First Symphony. In all of them conductor and orchestra were at their best, and in the case of the Symphony above even their better selves. No one not privileged to hear it at his hands could appreciate the degree in which Mr. Koussevitzky has rejuvenated, transformed and idealized the score that in the hands of others has seemed a music somewhat imperfectly realized, none too skillfully orchestrated, its one-time romantic freshness fast fading from it.

MONDAY SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its series of five Monday evening concerts tomorrow night, in Symphony hall, at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete"; Debussy's nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals"; and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

HER— Nov 11

ROLAND HAYES TODAY

This afternoon at 3:30 Roland Hayes will give a recital in Symphony hall. He will be accompanied by Percival Parham. The following program pays due homage to Schubert:

Caro Laccio ..... Gasperini
Chi Vuole Innamorarsi ..... Scarlatti
Off on a Plat of Rising Ground, air from "L'Allegro" ..... Handel
Die Krahe ..... Schubert
Die Post ..... Schubert
Die Nebensonnen ..... Schubert
Wohin ..... Schubert
Ships that Pass in the Night ..... Tyle
I will go with my father a-ploughing ..... Quilter
Shadow ..... Robinson
The Night Piece ..... Quilter
Doors where my heart used to be ..... W. S. Smith
Negro spirituals:
When I get home, Ezekiel saw de Wheel
In-a-Dat Mornin', My God Is So High.

SCHUBERT COMMEMORATION BY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the death of Franz Schubert at the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There will be two different Schubert programs for the two concerts. Friday the "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor and the "Tragic" Symphony No. 4. Miss Hulda Lashanska will sing a group of Schubert's lieder.

At the Saturday evening concert the Fifth Symphony in B-flat major, and the Seventh Symphony in C major. Miss Lashanska will sing a group of 205

The Concert REVIEWED

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the Eastman Theater

ROCHESTER TIMES-UNION OCT 30

By A. J. WARNER

The Program

"Classical" Symphony, Op. 25 .. Prokofieff
Allegro
Larghetto
Gavotte
Finale

Prelude a L'Apres-Midi D'un Faune" (The Afternoon of a Faun) ..... Debussy
Eclogue by S. Mallarme

Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet ..... Ravel
(Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 ..... Brahms
Allegro non troppo
Adagio non troppo
Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino
Allegro con spirito.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, paid one of its all too infrequent visits to Rochester last night and gave a concert of memorable beauty in the Eastman Theater before a large and rapturous audience. Under the baton of a musician who has been wisely characterized as challenging, provocative and alive, New England's venerable and distinguished band has assumed a new and quickening splendor which has made its performances a synonym for orchestral "Eventfulness."

The conductorial qualities of Mr. Koussevitzky do not lend themselves readily to definition. They are by no means of a sort that calls forth unanimous approbation, especially among reactionary music lovers, and much has been said and written concerning his manner of dealing with the classics. Yet boredom takes flight at Mr. Koussevitzky's concerts and the magic of an amazingly arresting personality ensnares his listeners. He has a complete faith, so it seems, in his own interpretive point of view and he proceeds to proclaim it with an irresistible intensity.

The assertion of those who hail him as a sensationalist is difficult, I have always felt, to credit. Rather is he a master of communicative individualism, passionately eager to convey, through the medium of his players what he is sure each composer means to say. Mr. Koussevitzky is almost invariably interesting and his orchestra—generally acknowledged to be one of the three or four greatest in the world—leaves behind it these days what Mr. W. J. Henderson has referred to as a resplendent trail of glory. Certainly last night's concert was a magnificent revelation of the present high attainments of the Boston Symphony in regard to technical proficiency—as an instrument whose various choirs sing as a single celestial voice.

Mr. Koussevitzky has a genius for choosing engrossing and harmonious programs. On this occasion he began with the "Classical" Symphony, op. 25, of Serge Prokefieff, the modern Russian, whose works he has so often elected to play for his Boston public. It was given a performance that was as transparent and spirited as the music is humorous, innocuous and facile. Nowhere to be found were the raucous and bizarre characteristics of the Prokofieff of the ballet "Chout" or the "Scythian Suite," and in their stead is an attempt—according to Felix Borowski, compiler of the program notes of the Chicago Orchestra — "to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." But, as Olin Downes has remarked, it would take at least a Mozart to imagine what Mozart would put into his scores if he were living today. To imitate the Mozartian idiom is indeed a rather "tall order." Mr. Prokofieff has, however, contrived some entirely agreeable music that is melodious and easy to hear. "Ersatz Mozart," Lawrence Gilman called it.

Debussy's masterwork in the realm of impressionism, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun," came next on the program and was played in superlative fashion—with the excerpts from his "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet, which reveal so bewilderingly the composer's necromancy in the realm of instrumentation. His score is a kaleidoscope of multi-colored sonorities and its performance last evening was an enchanting experience for the collective ear of the audience. One could only exclaim in wonder: "What an orchestra!"

The concert was brought to a close with Brahms' second symphony in D major op. 73 whose tenderness and serenity were exquisitely unfolded by a conductor who, though not controlled by tradition, never sacrificed the grace and beauty of the music to a desire to depart from the interpretive path of custom. Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were accorded an ovation at the end of the program.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 3 1 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra Lead by Koussevitzky Heard In Modern Classic Program

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Elmwood Music Hall last evening under the auspices of the Buffalo Musical Foundation, reached a point of perfection that left a large and brilliant audience unable to express its satisfaction in mere applause. Fortunately, there were music-lovers present to whom the sheer beauty of the entire presentation appealed so powerfully that they were content to sit in absolute silence, wrapped around with gorgeous harmony. No higher tribute could be paid Serge Koussevitzky and his band of musicians than the little breath of ecstasy that seemed to come from every listener at the close of each number. Sometimes it was a happy sigh, sometimes a delighted exclamation, sometimes a contented silence, but always sympathy and deep feeling.

Several engrossing features marked this first of the symphony concerts of Marian de Forest's series. One was the choice of an unusual and fascinating program; the second, Serge Koussevitzky's masterly phrasing, and third, the eloquent and impressive reading of Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major.

The program opened with the Classical Symphony of Prokofieff, the four movements, all very short, played with delicacy of tone and ease of execution that the Boston organization seems to achieve beyond all others. The leader's natural, simple way of conducting his band was as effective and striking as ever; and those delights which hearers enjoyed in the past from his intensive and delicate interpretation and the carefully-tutored response of his orchestra were in full evidence last evening. The tuneful lines of his readings sang with rich beauty; and not an opportunity for dramatic eloquence and contrast of mood but was seized with complete effect. But always his quiet taste and dignified scholarship were a restraining, artistic influence; the climax was reached in every case by way of exquisite tone and crescendo of deep feeling rather than by means of volume or speed. In fact one wondered were there any cymbals in the band, they were so conspicuously absent for a time, but when they did come, one learned just how fine could be their restrained effect. The Brahms Symphony had a superb hearing; the strings in perfect ensemble, the lighter passages done with fine, furtive skill, the climaxes full and inspiring. The four movements beautifully co-ordinated and worked into one poetic whole ended in a wonder of orchestral power, which brought the audience to its feet in spontaneous appreciation.

Especially appealing was the work of the flute, oboe, clarinet and harp, in the second number of the program, "The Afternoon of the Faun," a tone picture rich in instrumentation and beauty of feeling. The thing was made lyric with the rapture of emotion, harmony and imagination.

Orchestral's fragments from Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe made a lovely bit of modern tone poetry, the occasional drama worked into a song of rare texture, wonderful transitions of mood and skillful balance of effects. As played last night this work goes on record as one of the orchestra's most delightful numbers. It is the miming of the story of Pan and Syrinx; Chloe, impersonating the young nymph, with whom Pan falls in love. She does not respond but runs to hide until recalled by the witching notes of the lover's improvised flute. She dances to his music, her companions appear and the piece ends in a glorious burst of joyous tumult, the general dance.

It was here that the orchestra proved that the beauty of tone for which it is famous is never sacrificed for volume. This final movement ending in tremendous strength maintained all the liquid purity of tone and fine shading of the most delicate passages.—M. W.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF EXTRAS

Post Nov 13

Monday Audience Listens to Stravinsky's Gentle Ballet

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Last evening saw the first of the season's extra Symphony Concerts, which, as in past seasons, are to fall five on Monday evenings, five on Tuesday afternoons. The capacity audience was but to be expected, and the same comment might be made concerning its air of enthusiasm. The subscribers to these extra series have no cause to be sated with symphonic music, and in preparing his programmes for them Mr. Koussevitzky avoids compositions that through strangeness of idiom or extreme complexity might prove difficult of ready comprehension.

SCHUMANN'S FIRST

To be sure, the concert of last evening afforded one of the season's novelties, Stravinsky's music to his ballet "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." But this "Apollo Musagetes" reveals a Stravinsky wholly different from the author of the "Sacre du Printemps' or even of "Petrushka." In this, his latest music to be heard in America, Stravinsky has courted and captured classic simplicities. A gentle music, for the most part, is this; at times sweetly melancholy, and at times verging close to the more obvious type of ballet-music.

For the rest there came last evening only accepted masterpieces: Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Schumann's First Symphony. In all of them conductor and orchestra were at their best, and in the case of the Symphony above even their better selves. No one not privileged to hear it at his hands could appreciate the degree in which Mr. Koussevitzky has rejuvenated, transformed and idealized the score that in the hands of others has seemed a music somewhat imperfectly realized, none too skillfully orchestrated, its one-time romantic freshness fast fading from it.

MONDAY SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its series of five Monday evening concerts tomorrow night, in Symphony hall, at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will then present Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete"; Debussy's nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festivals"; and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major, No. 1.

HER—Nov 11

ROLAND HAYES TODAY

This afternoon at 3:30 Roland Hayes will give a recital in Symphony hall. He will be accompanied by Percival Parham. The following program pays due homage to Schubert:

Caro Laccio ..... Gasparini
Chi Vuole Innamorarsi ..... Scarlatti
Oft on a Plat of Rising Ground, air from "L'Allegro" ..... Handel
Die Kraehe ..... Schubert
Die Post ..... Schubert
Die Nebensonnen ..... Schubert
Wohin ..... Schubert
Ships that Pass in the Night ..... Tyler
I will go with my father a-ploughing ..... Quilter
Shadow ..... Robinson
The Night Piece ..... Quilter
Doors where my heart used to be ..... W. S. Smith

Negro spirituals:
When I get home. Ezekiel saw de Wheel.
In-a-Dat Mornin'. My God Is So High.

SCHUBERT COMMEMORATION BY SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the death of Franz Schubert at the concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. There will be two different Schubert programs for the two concerts. Friday the "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor and the "Tragic" Symphony No. 4. Miss Hulda Lashanska will sing a group of Schubert's lieder.

At the Saturday evening concert the Fifth Symphony in B-flat major, and the Seventh Symphony in C major. Miss Lashanska will sing a group of

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
OCT 3 1 1928

Boston Symphony

Four new musicians were introduced at the opening rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston. Serge Koussevitsky, then first assembling his orchestra, presented to them Georg Boettcher, the illustrious French horn virtuoso of Berlin, who has come from Europe to head the horn section.

Mr. Boettcher, born in Berlin in 1885, has had a notable career as solo horn of the Breslau Staat Teater, the Dortmund Symphony Orchestra, and in the Berlin Royald Opera Orchestra. He has held this position for the last 16 years, thus playing under all the foremost conductors of Central Europe.

The other new members are Y. Chardon, 'cello, N. Lauga, violin, and L. White, percussion. Two musicians returning, after a year's absence are M. Lafosse, trumpet, and E. Coughey, second harp. Bernard Zighera, familiar as pianist of the orchestra last season and as second harpist now takes his place as first harpist.

The orchestra will appear in Hartford at the Capitol Theater February 3. Reservations may be made by phone, 2-2251, or by mail direct to Frank A. Sedgwick, 89 Asylum Street, care of McCoy's, Inc.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
OCT

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestral Association concerts in Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon. The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Debussy's nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" ballet. On Saturday, the principal work is Brahm's Symphony No. 2 in D major. Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony, "The Afternoon of a Faun," by Debussy, and Ravel's orchestral excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
OCT 3 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

Will Present Programs in Mosque Friday and Saturday.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of 110 players, under Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra association concerts at Syria Mosque Friday night and Saturday afternoon.

The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica", Wagner's prelude to "The Master-singers of Nuremburg", Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and Fetes", and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" ballet. On Saturday, the principal work is Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major. Other works include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, "The Afternoon of a Faun", by Debussy, and Ravel's Orchestral Excerpts from "Daphnis et Chloe" ballet.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
OCT 3 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY OPENS HERE FRIDAY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, under the distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will open the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association concerts at Syria Mosque on Friday night and Saturday afternoon this week. The Friday night program will feature the Beethoven Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet. On Saturday afternoon the principal work is Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
OCT 3 1 1928

...luncheon at her home ...

* * *

MR. AND MRS. B. GWYNN HUNTINGTON will entertai at their home, 292 S. Columbia Ave., following the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday evening, honoring the conductor, Mr. Serge Koussevitzsky. Guests will be g... of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, their wives and husbands, members of the executive committee and their husbands, chairmen of divisions and their husbands; Mr. R. Burgin, concert master of the orchestra; Mr. J. Bedetti, cello; Mr. J. LeFranc, viola; Mr. G. Laurent, flute; Mr. F. Gillet, oboe, and Mr. G. Boetcher, horn.

* * *

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 3 1 1928

Boston Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last Sunday started out on its first long tour of the season, so that there will be no symphony concerts in Boston this week. The orchestra was heard in Rochester, N. Y., on Monday, played in Buffalo on Tuesday and tonight will give a program in Cleveland, a new place on its musical journeyings. Concerts in Columbus tomorrow and in Pittsburgh on Friday and Saturday will complete the week's trip. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the two concerts in Boston next week and the program will include the Third Symphony of Sibelius, to be heard for the first times there. November 18 will come a performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Jeannette Vreeland, well known in Lowell, will be one of the soloists.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
OCT 3 1 1928

SYMPHONY ARRIVES HERE ON THURSDAY

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Columbus Thursday at 1 p. m. in a special train from Cleveland for its concert in Memorial Hall at 8:15 p. m.

One baggage coach in the special will be entirely filled with instruments of the orchestra.

While in Columbus, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the Boston Orchestra, and the management will be guests at the Deshler-Wallick Hotel. After the Columbus concert, its first in 16 years, the Boston band will go to Pittsburgh for a two-day engagement, Friday and Saturday.

Tickets for the Boston concert went on sale Wednesday at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
OCT 3 1 1928

Symphony Concert

Among the patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who were to occupy boxes at Wednesday evening's concert at Masonic Auditorium are:

Mr. and Mrs. Chester C. Bolton, Mrs. Adella Prentiss Huges, Mr. Nikolai Sokoloff, Mr. and Mrs. Robert J. Bulkley, Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln G. Dickey, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Andrews, Mr. and Mrs. S. P. Halle, Mrs. Leonard C. Hanna, Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Eaton, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Dittmar, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Feather, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Hiss, Mr. David P. Hyman, Mr. George Clark Johnson, Mr. and Mrs. Harry D. Norvell, Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Smith, Dr. and Mrs. J. F. Stephan, Mrs. J. Tracy and Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Wall.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
Dispatch
OCT 3 1 1928

BOSTON BAND COMES FROM CLEVELAND

Preparations are being made to receive the Boston Symphony orchestra, which will arrive in Columbus, Thursday, at 1 p. m., by special train, for its concert in Memorial hall at 8:15 p. m. The orchestra and its heavy baggage will arrive from Cleveland, where a concert is scheduled in Masonic hall, Wednesday evening.

While in Columbus, Serge Koussevitzky, celebrated conductor of the orchestra, and its management, will be guests of the Deshler Wallick hotel.

Tickets for the Boston concert went on sale, Wednesday morning, at the Carl Koch Co., Third and Broad streets. Season tickets for the Cincinnati, Cleveland and Detroit concerts also are available.

SYMPHONY IN FIRST OF MONDAY SERIES

Varied Program Selected From Recent Concerts

GLOBE—NOV 13

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opened last night its current series of Monday evening concerts with a varied program of works selected, as usual, from those already offered at recent concerts of the Friday and Saturday series. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, opus 71, opened it characteristically; Stravinsky's new ballet music, "Apollon Musagete," provided the element of intriguing novelty. Debussy was represented by the two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Schumann's first symphony, in B flat, whose popularity Mr Koussevitzky has proved by frequent repetition, provided a cheerful conclusion.

Mr Koussevitzky's evident attachment to the "Leonore" overture is neither surprising nor discreditable. The nobility and dignity of the work need no description. Its slightly naive program does not detract from its beauty. Its impressive opening measures, no doubt, influenced the conductor in choosing it as the opening piece of both this and the regular series of concerts. It may be wished, however, that the conductor did not exaggerate their breadth so unduly, and mar by other vagaries of tempo what was in many ways a finely expressive reading of the work.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" is another step away from the prodigal brilliance and the uncompromising starkness of the composer's earlier styles. It is another step toward simplicity, but the simplicity of the Viennese ballroom and the classic ballet, as filtered through the mind of an unsentimental man. Stravinsky is here flirting rather condescendingly with the commonplace, and the result is some unusually graceful writing for string orchestra, and some pleasant, occasionally pungent, but not very important, music. It was admirably performed.

Mr Koussevitzky is improving his command of such nebulous beauty as that of Debussy's "Nuages," but it is with more pointed rhythms and more sparkling colors that he is most at ease. "Fetes," therefore, drew from him the more confident, the more successful performance—one which roused the audience to enthusiasm by its colorful gaiety.

Schumann's B flat symphony is a delightful work, but it has not the kind of beauty which Mr Koussevitzky seeks to impart to it by his characteristically dramatic method, full of violent contrasts and of emphasis. It suffers by his attempt to dress it in conventional symphonic pomp.

The usual applause rewarded the efforts of the orchestra and its conductor.

Music Notes and Comment

GLOBE NOV 11

Mr Koussevitzky has chosen different programs for the Friday and Saturday concerts in the regular Boston Symphony series this week, contrary to custom. He feels, apparently, that Schubert will be most fittingly honored here on the centenary of his death, by playing as much of his music as possible. The Friday audience will hear the familiar "Unfinished" and the "Tragic Symphony," remembered by some from a single performance some years ago. The Saturday subscribers will hear the great C major Symphony, and an unfamiliar early one in B major. At both concerts there will be groups of songs, of which the titles were not announced when this column went to press, sung by that admirable artist, Mme Hulda Lashanska, a Sembrich pupil, remembered here with enthusiasm by those who have heard her in former seasons.

It is announced from Symphony Hall that both the "Unfinished" and C major Symphonies of Schubert will be repeated this season, so that the subscribers to both series may hear both works. But there are those in the audiences more eager to hear the early works, now almost never performed.

And the Day's Pay

TRANS NOV 16

Commemorative Coin
(Two Schillings)
Struck in Austria for the Schubert Centenary

Franz Schubert died on Nov. 19, 1828, publishers of music, makers of records for mechanical musical instruments, lecturers on music and writers about music are busy in celebration of the centenary, all sweating and working overtime and in shifts. It was to be expected that orchestras would present Schubert programs to their audiences.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will perform on Friday afternoon the "Unfinished" and "Tragic" symphonies and Mme Hulda Lashanska will sing a group of songs. For Saturday evening, the program will be wholly different: The symphony in B flat major No. 5; the great—and long—one in C major and other songs than those of Friday.

Mme. Lashanska, born in New York, in 1892, studied in that city and in Paris. In 1913 she was married to Harold A. Rosenbaum. She sang for the first time in Boston at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Jan. 28, 1921 (Pamina's air from "The Magic Flute" and "Depuis le jour" from "Louise.")

HER —NOV 15

Eugene Gruenberg who died last Sunday night in Cambridge City Hospital, had undergone a severe operation, so serious a one that in a letter we received from him, while he was hopeful of recovery, he wrote in a semi-ironical way about the possibilities. We knew him first as a viola player in the Boston Symphony orchestra. His associates in that section when he left the orchestra in 1895 or 1896, were Messrs. Svecenski, Zach, H. Heindl, Saur, Kolster, Hoyer, Kluge, Krauss, Barleben.

Our friend was not only a well-grounded, excellent musician, he was a man of liberal education, versed in ancient and modern literature, interested in branches of science, a lover of all that is beautiful in art and nature. He was an entertaining companion, witty, anecdotical, but never boresome. It was his pleasure, and the pleasure of some now living, to sit with Arthur Nikisch, Franz Kneisel, Anton Hekking, the violinist, in the back room of the Old Elm after a concert. There was then good talk about music; there was gossip about musicians, nor was the conversation always thus narrowed.

In his later years Gruenberg led a useful life in Boston as a teacher. His work as editor of music and instructive writer was highly valued; his companionship was sought by those who could appreciate frankness of opinion, original views, hatred of injustice, and faithfulness and tolerance in friendship.

Sunday will [illegible] those who feel it their duty to attend concerts, though it is the Lord's day. Many will look upon the performance of the Ninth Symphony in the afternoon as a religious ceremony, and not without reason. The Boston Symphony orchestra will then be assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Ratcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Mmes. Vreeland and Van Der Vere; Messrs. Althouse and Gange. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct this concert in aid of the pension fund of the orchestra.

Programs to Hand

TRANS

From Symphony Hall, announcing the songs to be sung with piano-accompaniment by Mme. Lashanska at the commemorative Symphony Concerts this week for Schubert. On Friday afternoon:

NOV 15

Des Mädchen's Klage
Du bist die Ruh'
Heidenrös lein
Der Tod und das Mädchen
Hark, Hark, the Lark

On Saturday evening:

Litaney
An die Musik
Ungeduld
Der Neugierige
Die böse Farbe

Mr. Koussevitzky reasonably believes that Schubert expressed himself more characteristically in his songs than in any other medium. The conductor's original plan for the centenary concerts left room for eight to be sung on Friday afternoon, and eight more on Saturday evening. Each list was also to include pieces undeservingly neglected. When, however, he cast about for an available singer capable of sixteen, he could find none, much less one willing to enlarge the familiar repertory. Only Miss Gerhardt could have fulfilled his purpose—and she is in Berlin.

From Mr. Burgin, as assistant conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, for its concerts of Nov. 30 and Dec. 1:

Overture to the Opera, "Rouslan and Ludmilla" ..... Glinka
Concerto, No. 5, in E-flat major for Piano and Orchestra ("The Emperor")... Beethoven
(Pianist: Mr. Ganz)
Symphony, No. 8..... Miaskovsky

Miaskovsky's Symphony was announced by Mr. Koussevitzky for performance last April. No parts, however, were obtainable. Now Mr. Burgin will undertake it—the first music of an eminent Russian in next to the last generation to be heard in Boston.

Incidents and Prospects

Last summer, in Vienna, whither various errands called him, Mr. Koussevitzky laid in a stock of the commemorative two schilling pieces, struck by the Austrian mint to mark the centenary of Schubert's death. On one face, reproduced in another column, they bear a relief of the composer's head; on the other, the arms of the eight provinces that make the present Republic. Yesterday, at the rehearsal, before conductor and orchestra set to Schubert's Symphony in C major, he handed each player one of these coins as memento of the anniversary and keepsake of "the Schubert Year."

SCHUBERT MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Centenary of Composer's Death Commemorated

GLOBE—NOV 17

Hulda Lashanska Heard as Soloist In Five of Schubert's Songs

The centenary of the death of Schubert, which occurred Nov 19, 1828, is commemorated at this week's Boston Symphony concerts. Mr Koussevitzky has chosen two programs of his music. Yesterday the Friday subscribers heard an unfamiliar early work, the "Tragic Symphony"; five songs sung by Mme Hulda Lashanska to pianoforte accompaniment, and the "Unfinished Symphony."

Tonight the Saturday subscribers are to hear a different early symphony, in B flat; five songs, not the ones sung Friday, and the C-major symphony. It it hard to fathom the reason for offering two programs where but one was expected. A note in the program promised that both the "Unfinished" and the C-major symphonies will be repeated this season, so that all subscribers will eventually hear both works. But there are those who would like to hear more of the early symphonies, now almost never played. If two programs were thought necessary they should have been given in successive weeks, so that the two subscription series, announced as identical, might remain so.

The difference between the boyish, groping Schubert of the "Tragic Symphony," written when he was 19, and the full-fledged genius of the "Unfinished Symphony," written when he was 24, is startling. The early work is full of the influence of Beethoven, crude, immature, and, save for the lovely theme of the andante, not distinguished by that melodic invention which is the most notable quality in Schubert's work.

It is of doubtful service to Schubert's memory to disinter from oblivion such things as this "Tragic Symphony." Only a perfect performance could now make it appealing. But yesterday's performance was far from perfect. Mr Koussevitzky, as usual, gave a reading that had eloquence and vigor, but the orchestra played with ragged attacks and uncertain phrasing which betokened scanty rehearsal.

The "Unfinished Symphony," on the other hand, was very beautifully played. Mr Koussevitzky when he first conducted this masterpiece in Boston departed, and not fortunately, from all traditions, in a misguided endeavor to make music essentially lyric portentously dramatic. Though he seldom alters his readings, he has now abandoned that conception of the work. Yesterday, except that the andante con moto was taken somewhat too slowly, one could pick no flaws in his interpretation. There was much to praise, much to enjoy. Every measure was given full value without detracting from the whole composition. Each of many felicitous details contributed to the general impression. The orchestra played the familiar music with exquisite euphony. Maj Higginson, with whom this symphony was a favorite, would have been pleased with the performance.

Mme Lashanska, one of the earliest of Mme Sembrich's pupils to achieve a notable success in the concert hall, greatly pleased the audience by her singing of five Schubert songs, "Des Madchen's Klage," "Du bist die Ruh," "Heidenroeslein," "Der Tod und das Maedchen" and "Hark, Hark the Lark." All but the first of these were, of course, familiar to everyone, so that the omission of the texts from the program book, necessitated by a late choice of program, did not greatly matter. Tonight Mme Lashanska will sing "Litany," "Der Veugierige," "Ungeduld," "An die Musik" and "Die Bose Farbe," a list distinctly less familiar.

The program announced Mme Lashanska as a soprano, and she plainly wishes to be so considered. Yet nature has gifted her with an exquisite mezzo-soprano voice. Yesterday her singing of "Death and the Maiden," with its sustained low notes, was of startling beauty. In the other songs, as for instance, "Du bist die Ruh'" she was obliged to force her tone to an unpleasant and at moments breathless shrillness on high notes, though when she sang not more than mezzo forte, and not beyond her natural voice range, her tones were of rare loveliness. Her interpretations were unaffected and in the right spirit, though they lacked the distinction of style found in the work of such specialists in Schubert as Lena Gerhardt.

Schubert is pre-eminently the lyricist among composers. It is the songlike quality of the B-minor and C-major symphonies that makes them immortal. It is the exquisite romanticism of the best songs, such as "Du bist die Rur'" and "Auf dem Wasser zu Singen," the blending of melody into mood, that touches the heart of the listener. These qualities would win enduring fame for a composer with faults far graver and more numerous than Schubert's.

There are no subscription concerts here next week, as the orchestra goes on tour. Mr Burgin will conduct the next pair of concerts here, Nov 30 and Dec 1.

P. R.

HER MUSIC NOV 17

BOSTON SYMPHONY

By PHILIP HALE

As Franz Schubert died on Nov. 19, 1828, Mr. Koussevitzky arranged two programs: one for the concert of yesterday afternoon; the other for the concert tonight. Mme. Hulda Lashanska, soprano, was chosen for the singer of the songs; Pierre Luboshutz as the pianist. Yesterday's program was as follows: Symphony No. 4, C minor, the "Tragic"; these songs: "Das Maedchen's Klage," "Du bist die Ruh," "Heidenroesein," "Der Tod und das Maedchen," "Hark, Hark, the Lark." The "Unfinished" symphony, B minor.

The program for tonight will comprise the symphony in B flat major, No. 5. Songs: "Litaney," "Der Neugierige," "Ungeduld," "An die Musik," "Die boese Farbe." Symphony No. 7, C major.

The "Unfinished" symphony and the great one in C major would naturally find a place on the program of any concert in memory of Schubert. The choice of the fourth and fifth symphonies in addition to them gave the audience the opportunity of noting the composer's development as a symphonist. There was historical interest attending the selection, yet some would have gladly heard excerpts from the charming music for "Rosamunde," as being more Schubertian.

When it came to the songs it seemed as if there should have been three singers if the composer were to be well represented in this field: a dramatic soprano, a lyric soprano, and a baritone. Few of the great songs are on the programs of this week. One misses "Die Allmacht," "Die junge Nonne," "Gretchen am Spinnrad," "An Schwager Kronos," "Der Doppelgaenger," "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus," "Am Meer," "Der Atlas," "Der Wanderer," "Die Stadt," "Erkoenig," and others, not forgetting "Der Zwerg." Mme. Lashanska is a lyric soprano. She naturally chose the songs she thought best suited to her voice; yet she was most successful yesterday as a singer and an interpreter in "Tod und das Maedchen," which brought out the richest notes of her voice. And it is not purely lyrical.

She was first heard in Boston at a Symphony concert nearly eight years ago. Her voice was then even and beautiful. Yesterday the upper tones lacked agreeable quality, and in "Heidenroeslein," flexibility, spontaneous delivery were missed. "Du bist die Ruh" calls for a sustained mood of calmness, an absence of emotional stress. This was lost by reason of the evident labor in producing the upper notes of ascending phrases. There was always intelligent conception of the songs; the excellent intention was evident, but the voice did not always lend itself to the carrying out of the aesthetic purpose. Mr. Luboshutz played the accompaniments musically. The singer was loudly applauded.

The "Tragic" symphony as a whole was first performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra seven years ago. The word "Tragic" can justly be applied only to the first movement if emotional intensity is demanded, though the headlong rush of the Finale is not without dramatic force in spite of certain melodic lines that might be found in Italian overtures of Rossini's fecund period. The slow movement in the aria form is suave in its tunefulness, while the Scherzo has little of a pronounced character. With the exception, then, of the first movement with its sombre introduction, the symphony hardly answers to its title.

The performance of the "Tragic" and the "Unfinished" was of noteworthy excellence. It would be late in the day to rhapsodize over the latter miracle of musical poetry. Yet M. Bourgault Ducoudray, writing of the first movement some years ago, found that at the return of the "funereal shadow which overspreads the initial theme" after the enchanting song first sung by violoncellos, "the spectre of death rises before us! Mortal joys are fleeting; the roses of earthly happiness are soon faded, and Nature has put into man's heart a craving for a bliss which knows no satiety." Fine words, but it is better to hear the music and forget what has been said about it. The noblest music is not to be explained nor translated. The "Unfinished" symphony—who would have had even Schubert complete it; or Coleridge his "Kubla Khan"?

If Mr. Koussevitzky brought out the exquisite romanticism of this symphony, he did not forget to emphasize the passages of mournfulness that once at least are those of wild despair.

SCHUBERT IS HONORED AT SYMPHONY

HER NOV 17

By MOSES SMITH

One hundred years ago—to be exact, on November 19, 1828—Franz Schubert, of immortal memory, died in Vienna. This week's pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are in the nature of a centenary celebration. Each program contains two symphonies and a group of songs, done by Hulda Lashanska. And the programs are distinct, to provide the opportunity to render the largest possible number of compositions.

As we write, we can refer only to the Friday afternoon concert as an established fact. Judging from it, the present centenary is not to be classed at all with the Beethoven centenary festival in Symphony Hall two years ago. Naturally the latter was a longer affair. It is not so natural and just that it should have been better prepared than the present pair of programs.

Schubert's symphonies are no harder to play than Beethoven's. If yesterday's performance fell below the expected level the cause is obviously to be found in insufficient rehearsal, which is a poor way of paying homage to the gentle and songful Franz. Mr. Koussevitsky's conception of the fourth symphony, the "Tragic," seemed adequate to the nobility of the music, but the orchestral execution was by no means on the same plane.

The "Unfinished" symphony went much better, but not with the brilliance of Mr. Koussevitsky's previous readings of that work here. Both in this symphony, and even more in the "Tragic," the orchestra was by no means the virtuoso instrument that we have begun to expect it to be.

Miss Lashanska's share in the festivities was also less than the nature of the occasion demanded. Her artistry is mature and often profound, but not always unmannered. Her voice, especially in the lower section, has lovely tones; but the high ones tend to a disconcerting shrillness. Her work was intelligent, carefully, sometimes movingly done, and that was all.

Symphony

Anniversary Rites Begin For Schubert

TRANS Nov 17

Two Symphonies, Five Songs, from Mr. Koussevitzky and Mme. Lashanska

THE CEREMONIAL of a Beethoven Centenary sorts ill with the marking of a hundredth anniversary for the smaller-voiced and homelier Schubert. Who has forgotten that memorable Monday evening, eighteen months ago in Symphony Hall, when a bust of the great Ludwig overlooked the scene; the eminences of music in Boston sat in august array on the stage; while Mr. Ernest Newman, imported from London for the occasion, divided Beethoven's life and works into three periods—division not unknown to at least a hundred previous commentators? No bust of Schubert stood above the orchestra yesterday afternoon; that excellent band, in the diminished numbers proper to the music before it, filled its usual place. Dignitaries, if any were present, distributed themselves unobtrusively about parquet or balcony; Mr. Koussevitzky went about his conducting business as though the Friday in 1928 nearest to the nineteenth of November, were any other Friday on the concert-calendar. So true to rule and custom was the occasion that eleventh-hour prophecies stood fulfilled. No sooner had sundry young gentlemen from the university discovered "The Unfinished Symphony" at the end of the program than they declared with one voice that when the slow movement was sighing saddest and sweetest, there would be audible departures from the hall. There were.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 207

207

This or that circumstance, however, seemed out of the common. With its reduced ranks the orchestra looked hardly itself. Empty was the corner of the percussion-instruments—dear to the modernists. The harps had gone on holiday. Five trumpets and five trombones—not forgetting eight horns—would have alarmed the ghost of Schubert as seven days before they had solaced the shade of Skriabin. In the eighteen-twenties, to which we were all supposed to be harking back, Schubert was magical hand upon the wood-winds, drawing from them euphonies and tints, sighs and tears of song, unknown to his predecessors; but in each group two—and not Debussy's three or Strauss's four—sufficed him. By their own fit spirits, upon a few instruments, did the singing composers work their miracles. . . . For the first time, also, since Mr. Koussevitzky took over the Symphony Concerts—the record-keepers said in the intermission—songs to piano-accompaniment had place upon a program, five in all, out of Schubert, sung by Mme. Lashanska. . . . Finally, not a sign was discoverable in the audience that it was celebrating centenary rites for "le plus poëte que jamais." Even the usually over-flowing editor of the program-book double-leaded his pages, as though he, too, were experiencing shortage of matter.

Mr. Koussevitzky chooses "The Faun" or the frequenter suite out of Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloë," and we listeners say one to another: "Now we shall hear and know the virtuosity of the orchestra." He leads in Strauss's Eulenspiegel or Stravinsky's Petrushka and again we perk up our ears "for to see and to admire." Yet, in kind, Schubert's "Tragic" and "Unfinished" symphonies—still more the symphony in C major of this evening—may test and disclose the players. They have need of their choicest shaping of phrases, balancing and blending of voices; must modulate with sensitive lips and fingers; keep both swift and fluent inexhaustibly; cultivate a tone unflecked; pass at the composer's will from the Andante of "The Unfinished"—through sundry periods "la plus triste musique que jamais"—to the Rossinian glint of the earlier Finale. As this and that standard or novel piece goes its way in the course of a season, we praise the orchestra for poignancy, pungency or delicacy through measures of "instrumental song." Put by the Schubert of the perfunctory or the careless repetitions, and his orchestra must be perpetually sensitive and accomplished singer. It was such throughout the concert yesterday, at the bidding and under the stimulus of Mr. Koussevitzky's skill, discernment and devotion. In plastic progress, transparent tone, lyrical voice, Mozart himself could not have been better served.

Making centenary programs the conductor confined himself to the symphonies and the songs of Schubert. He had no mind to excursions among curiosities or to adventures among resurrections both of which anniversary pastimes usually evoke the commoner, cheaper, locally Viennese Schubert, prone to dance-tunes, military rhythms and choir-gallery formulas. Even the theater-pieces with which Schubert outfitted "Rosamond, Queen of Cyprus"—sleazy play that endured through one performance—did not tempt him, though most conductors have found them the only off-set to the symphonic Schubert. Back to the Symphony in C minor, written in the composer's twentieth year; somehow, somewhere, sometime labelled "The Tragic," Mr. Koussevitzky went for beginning; with the inevitable "Unfinished" made his end; between set not too fortunate songs.

Had any other name than Schubert's been signed to this Fourth Symphony, long since it would have descended into oblivion. Probably symphonies quite as meritorious were known to the Vienna of 1816 from hands that even the learned doctors of music nowadays hardly recognize. Yet it has moments. Underneath surface-suavities, the slow introduction gains a gravity of substance and motion not too frequent in the music of a superficial time and city, though Beethoven himself wrote for them. Play of feeling, deeper than songful fertility, may be detected in the ensuing first movement. The slow division now and then breathes a sweet-sad melancholy and escapes, for the most part, tempting lapses into formula and commonplace. The minuet and trio are nothing else, while the finale, speedy, fluent and bright, suggests a youthful Schubert frequenting the Italian opera, in his day at high vogue in Vienna. Consider also the adroit playing of the orchestra and these centenary twenty-five minutes were not wasted.

At the end of "The Unfinished," it were possible to write Donne's line: "This is a melting heart, and a troubled heart, and a wounded heart." Then count the reviewer's task done. For the record—that precious shibboleth—he might add that Mr. Koussevitzky read the piece with fewer singularities than he sometimes ventures; responded to it more deeply and less sentimentally; yet will still lead in significant or returning themes, notably the first, as though Chaikovsky, a composer of quite another kidney, were looking over his and Schubert's, shoulders. If more is needed, this "torso" confirmed the belief that it is a finished statue in tones; that Schubert had sounded, in these two movements, the depths of the matter and the moods within him; that he would not and could not further go; that those sketches for a Scherzo were the warning and the discovery.

Be it also said that those who descant upon the dramatic and the pathetic content of "The Unfinished Symphony" possibly overdo discretion. Schubert could not put action into music—the action, for example, that thrills out of Beethoven's first movements, say in "The Eroica," and sends his finales upleaping; the more reflective, less turbulent action that stirs through similar movements of Brahms, in the first Allegro of the Symphony in C minor, in the Passacaglia-Finale of the fourth. No more could Schubert release the depths of woe or wring the heart with pity. He could muse sadly; muse longingly; infuse his measures with the wistful melancholy that is one phase of the romantic temperament. He could give voice to these moods with the unfolding tenderness suffusing the "Unfinished Symphony." Throughout, it was this subdued and melting note that Mr. Koussevitzky sounded yesterday in a truer, more objective version of a symphony in which, at his first coming, he surprised us all. Yet Schubert's melancholy passes quickly. In his heart he is all for the major keys. This evening we shall hear them at longest and fullest.

The conductor believes with reason that Schubert's genius flowered in the best of his songs, particularly in some that are seldom heard in the current, hackneyed, repertory. He would have had eight sung—a few rarities and masterpieces among them—at either centenary concert. Miss Gerhardt, the one singer capable and ambitious for the task—he discovered regretfully—is spending the autumn in Berlin. His second choice, Mme. Rethberg, was deep in rehearsals at the Metropolitan Opera House. Mme. Lashanska was his refuge in time of embarrassment. Her voice, however, is too light and thin for the depths or the heights of Schubert song-writing. It lacks the necessary warmths, elasticities, colors. She misses the Schubertian felicities, animations, divining strokes. What is there to say of a singer of Schubert, though she succeed in degree with the contrasts of "Death and the Maiden," who somehow misses the heart-wringing transition, when the melodic curve pauses, stays, then remounts at deeper concentration in "Du bist die Ruh'?" Or whose lark wings the earth rather than the skies? And is "Heiden Röslein," lilting song though it be, representative of any but the too fluent, too careless Schubert?

H. T. P.

Post Nov 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is this week making its first New York trip of the present season. On its return, Mr. Koussevitzky will have a week's respite from conductorial duties, and Richard Burgin, the concert-master and regular assistant conductor of the orchestra, will direct the concerts of Nov. 30 and Dec. 1. At these concerts, too, Rudolph Ganz will be heard with the orchestra as pianist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

Every ticket for today's pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchester was sold far in advance. Mr Koussevitzky has very wisely decided to perform the "Leonore No. 3" overture by way of prelude to the Ninth Symphony, so that late-comers need not disturb the interval between the first and second movements of the symphony.

GLOBE Nov 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays this week the first of its annual visits to New York and way stations. Mr Koussevitzky, who has been very busy with the Ninth Symphony and the making of several phonograph recordings, as well as his routine duties, is going to take a week's vacation after the New York trip. Mr Burgin will conduct the next pair of Boston concerts Nov 30 and Dec 1. His program includes Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony and Glinks overture to "Russian and Ludmilla." As soloist, Rudolph Ganz, former conductor of the St Louis Symphony, will play Beethoven's "Emperor Concerto." One wonders why Mr Ganz was not invited to conduct the concert.

The new phonograph records of the Boston Symphony will be the first since the days of Dr Muck. The present orchestral records, made by the new electric process, are certain to be an astonishing improvement over the former ones. The titles cannot yet be released for publication. There will be in the next few years a number of Boston Symphony records, as the trustees of the orchestra have made a long term contract with the Victor Company.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This week will see the orchestra's first visit to New York. The concerts of Nov. 30 and Dec. 1, will be conducted by Richard Burgin, who is the regular assistant conductor of the orchestra. As soloist at these concerts, Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, will play Beethoven's fifth concerto in E flat, "The Emperor." Mr Burgin will introduce to Boston the Eighth Symphony of Miaskovsky. He will open the concert with Glinka's overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Nov 18

This afternoon in Symphony hall, at 3:30, the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its annual autumn Pension Fund concert. Mr. Koussevitzky will then conduct Beethoven's Ninth symphony, Boston Symphony orchestra in combination with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The soloists will be Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. As in introductory number, Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, will be played.

NINTH SYMPHONY FOR PENSION FUND

Harvard and Radcliffe Choruses Assist

Koussevitzky Conducts Eloquent Performance of Masterpiece

GLOBE —— Nov 19

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society gave Beethoven's Ninth Spmphony yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. Mr Koussevitzky conducted an unusually eloquent and compelling performance of the familiar masterpiece.

At the end there was a remarkable enthusiastic and prolonged outburst of applause, in which Dr A. T. Davison, who had trained the Harvard Glee Club, and G. Wallace Woodworth, who had prepared the Radcliffe Choral Society shared with Mr Koussevitzky, the orchestra, the chorus, and the four professional soloists. The hall had been sold out weeks in advance. Several thousand would-be purchasers of tickets were disappointed.

Mr Koussevitzky repeated his brilliatn reading of Beethoven's "Lenore No. 3" overture before the Ninth Symphony. The dramatic quality of this work deeply stirs his imagination. One again admired especially the way he brought out the famous melodic phrase that follows the trumpet call off stage; and his handling of the exuberant close of the overture.

Not since the days of Dr Muck have the instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony been played in Boston anywhere nearly as well as they were yesterday. Never within the memory of the writer, which extends back to a performance in 1910 under Mr Fiedler, has the choral finale been as thrilingly and perfectly sung here as it was yesterday by an eager and well-schooled group of college students.

The four professional soloists were inadequate, as they always are in American performances of the Ninth Symphony. What Beethoven wanted was a quartet of phenomenal voices; a quartet of first rate musicians. Suppose that Florence Austral, or Dusolina Giannini, had been the soprano; Mme Schumann Heink in her best days the contralto; Jean de Reszke the tenor; and Alexander Kipnis the bass and you get a notion of what is really needed for this quartet. Of the singers named, one is dead; and one too old. Can the names of singers now flourishing be substituted for those of Schumann Heink and de Reszke without loss? Have we a contralto and a tenor vocally and musically adequate, as the soprano and bass named would be?

In fairness to the four singers heard yesterday it should be said that they were above the average of vocalists commonly heard in choral works here. The kind of quartet one would like to hear would, if it could be assembled, cost these days about as much as the total receipts of the concert, unless the singers gave their services, as the chorus yesterday did.

This time Mr Koussevitzky succeeded in getting the chorus to carry out his strikingly individual conception of how the choral sections should go. No doubt there had been much previous consultation with the conductors of the two choruses, and adequate full rehearsal. The resulting performance was so thrilling, so movingly beautiful that even listeners convinced that the finale of the Ninth Symphony is inferior to the instrumental movements could not but be deeply impressed.

P. R.

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT

Post Nov 19

Beethoven's 9th Given With Harvard and Radcliffe Choirs

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Thanks to the devotion of Mr. Koussevitkzy and the co-operation of the choruses of Harvard and Radcliffe and of their conductors, Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, Beethoven's stupendous Ninth Symphony, once a rarity in these parts, may now be heard at Symphony Hall every second season. Yesterday afternoon, for a third time since his coming to Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky led these combined forces through a performance of this colossal work in a concert dedicated to the Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

VOICES BETTER THAN EVER

At this late date it were idle to comment in detail upon Mr. Koussevitzky's vital conception of Beethoven's masterpiece or upon the ready response of singers and instrumentalists to his wishes. Yet it may be set down as one listener's impression that the performance of yesterday, particularly on the vocal side, even surpassed its predecessors.

When the Ninth Symphony was given here two years ago, in connection with the Symphony Orchestra's Beethoven Centenary celebration, a distinguished English visitor suggested that the youthful singers from Harvard and Radcliffe, however eager and well disciplined, lacked the maturity and consequent body of voice essential to the fullest realization of Beethoven's wishes. Yesterday, however, such criticism would have been less applicable, for body of tone these young men and women most assuredly did provide. And there was besides this, the enthusiasm and, in the soprano choir, the freshness of voice, to mitigate Beethoven's cruel exactions of their upper register that few mature and professional choruses might provide. And in the Ninth Symphony, more than in most other compositions, proficiency is only half the battle. The spirit that inflames must, above all else, be present, if the work's true meaning is to come to fulfillment.

As before, the audience filled every available place, and at the end there was the marked enthusiasm that has greeted previous performances, with applause for conductor, chorus and orchestra, for the excellent soloists, Mmes. Vreeland and Van Der Veer and Messrs. Althouse and Gange. Once more, too, when Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth were brought to the stage, enthusiasm already great waxed greater.

As preface to the Ninth Symphony the orchestra was heard in a stirring performance of Beethoven's Overture to Leonore No. 3.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

For the fall concert in aid of the Symphony orchestra's pension fund Mr. Koussevitzky evidently concluded he could scarcely do better than to repeat Beethoven's ninth symphony, a work with which he roused high enthusiasm at the Beethoven centenary a year and a half ago. To assist him in his endeavor he called in the help of the Harvard Glee club, Dr. Archibald T Davison, conductor; the Radcliffe Choral society, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor; Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Nevada Van Der Veer, contralto; Paul Althouse, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass, and because he felt the symphony something too short for a full afternoon's entertainment he preceded it with the overture to Leonore, No. 3.

In his choice of attractions Mr. Koussevitzky showed sound judgment. Every seat was occupied, and most of the possible standing room. For the overture the audience expressed approval extremely hearty, and for the symphony they proceeded to demonstrations more emphatic still, for all three conductors concerned. The concert proved an occasion.

HER Nov 19

About an occasion it is rarely necessary to write many words of critical comment.

Let it answer, therefore, to set down the opinion that Mr. Koussevitzky, in quite his highest form, made the drama of Leonore more operatically dramatic than even is his wont. The symphony's scherzo, judiciously paced, he threw off with amazing brilliance. Taking, too, the adagio, at a normal tempo, he read it nobly, with an inspiring sensitiveness to its beauty of color scheme and, of greater importance, to its extraordinary beauty of melody.

In robuster mood when he approached the first movement and the last, Mr. Koussevitzky chose to present them both as a music of mass, of bulk; by the pyramids along the Nile they might have been suggested, or the great Chinese wall we read about. Although not everybody hears these great movements so merely massive and big, there is no denying that Mr. Koussevitzky, who does so hear them, is a master hand at swelling bigness to something truly enormous.

He had excellent help yesterday. The soloists stood secure and firm. The choruses, admirably trained, were able to give Mr. Koussevitzky, at the instant he made the signal, the vast waves of sound he wanted—even as they gave Mr. Monteux, a few years ago, the finer shading he called for. They sang, it should be recorded, accurately in tune. Valuable help, in very truth, they lent Mr. Koussevitzky. And the audience approved.

R. R. G.

Shouts and Murmurs

TRANS Nov 26

Mr. Koussevitzky in New York

UPON the concert in New York of the Boston Orchestra last Thursday, the reviewers concentrated themselves. It was Mr. Koussevitzky's first visit to Manhattan in the current season, and a quasi-novel number, Stravinsky's ballet, "Apollo," played as concert-piece, stood on the program. Besides, there were no distractions; whereas on Saturday afternoon, when conductor and orchestra gave a second concert, Respighi's opera, "The Sunken Bell," was undergoing first performance in America at the Metropolitan Opera House. For the matinée, as well, Mr. Koussevitzky assembled only "repertory pieces"—Prokofiev's Classical Symphony; the abridged Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Petrushka"; Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Brahms's Symphony in F major. Consequently the deputized reviewers were no more than perfunctory, remarking that the conductor excelled with the numbers from Prokofiev, Stravinsky and Debussy; but was less fortunate in his version of Brahms. They noted also that the "Classical Symphony" bore repetition well.

Warmths

Back, then, to the concert of Thursday at which, we are told, Mr. Koussevitzky was received with a "protracted demonstration." The Sun enjoyed it all saying:

> The title [of "Apollo"] indicates a desire to create a classic atmosphere and this Stravinsky has done with signal success. The employment of strings unassisted affords a delightful clarity and serenity; and his recent return to earlier ideals of musical beauty than those in "Le Sacre de Printemps" gives us tonalities which would have found favor among the fathers. There is nothing harsh, nothing eccentric, nothing bizarre. The music is chaste, dignified, restful, and it is genuinely beautiful.

Furthermore, it is Stravinsky's own. His classic fields are not those of Gluck yet they have the fragrance of Greece and suggest the academic grove. This ballet-suite seems likely to outlive several immediate predecessors in the Stravinskian catalogue, works in which the musician was apparently not quite certain of his path or his destination. He has come happily out of the woods into the sunlight of a better day.

Following the ballet-suite was Schumann's symphony in B flat. Its maker intended at one time to call it the "Spring" Symphony and it glows and throbs with the rising blood of the vernal season. Assuredly Mr. Koussevitzky felt that it did. There has not been such a full-throated delivery of this pasionate instrumental song in years. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether the composition was ever read with more intensity, more thrill, more palpitating spirit. The orchestra gave a performance which was superlatively fine in opulence of tone and finish of style. The old work rose to new life. When it was played as it was last evening it puts on the shining garb of immortality.

The Evening Post was nearly as well disposed: "There were no dancers [in 'Apollo'], no visual action, but, instead, the nobly sonorous strings of the Boston Orchestra and the exceedingly sensitive and vital leadership of Mr. Koussevitzky to concentrate attention on the score. The performance was one to disclose all this music may possess of aristocratic workmanship and perhaps to seem to invest it with qualities more truly those of the performers than of the pages their performance brought to life. Like the other ballets of Stravinsky 'Apollo' fared much better, musically, out of the theater than in it. Poor as much of the material still seemed, it boasted of such richness and delicacy of string-sonorities as could only be contemplated with ungrudged admiration. Perhaps this was due chiefly to the playing of Mr. Koussevitzky's band. But Igor Stravinsky provided them with the substance it was their lot to play."

Questionings

Of course, the professionally "earnest" in and out of the concert-hall, dissented and, as usual The Times speaks for them: "The piece ['Apollo'] is plausible. It affords a polished and empty imitation of styles and models that it is fashionable to imitate in musical Paris of today, which Stravinsky, expatriated, makes his home, and where he is flattered and fêted. The emptiness and facility of the music soon become a weariness to the flesh. Why should it stop? Why not write a dozen more dance-pieces that posture and prattle of nothing." Nor did Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Schumann's Symphony content all hearers. Again The Times shall be spokesman: "If Mr. Koussevitzky had been less inclined to bestow a gratuitous prominence on insignificant details of the accompaniment [in the slow movement] the result would have been still more felicitous. His tempi in parts of the scherzo and of the finale were unconventional, and perhaps excessively fast. . . . This writer would have welcomed less of the virtuoso element in certain pages and more of the adorable simplicity native to the Schumann of the 'Spring' Symphony.

Epilogue

As for the final number, Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," The Herald-Tribune said it all in a single sentence: "Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston players almost succeed in endowing it with a resemblance to truly great music," while even The Times heard an audience "applaud and applaud and applaud."

Music Notes and Comment

Globe Nov 25

Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now given in announcements from Symphony Hall the title of "assistant conductor," will conduct the concerts in the regular Friday and Saturday series this week. Mr Koussevitzky's present contract entitles him to entrust three of the 24 pairs of concerts to other hands. Mr Burgin's program includes the first performance here of Miaskovsky's Eighth Symphony. The composer, now living in Moscow, is a Russian in his 40s, with a considerable reputation in his own country. None of his music has hitherto been heard in Boston, but several of his earlier symphonies have been played in other American cities. The soloist will be the noted pianist, Rudolph Ganz, who for some seasons was conductor of the St Louis Symphony, a post he resigned last year. Mr Ganz will play the greatest of the five Beethoven concertos, the one in E flat called "The Emperor."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Eighth Symphony of Nicholas Miaskovsky, a contemporary Russian as yet unknown to Boston, and the "Emperor" Concerto of Beethoven, with Rudolph Ganz as the pianist, are the two pieces announced for the symphony concerts of this week, to be directed by Richard Burgin, concert-master and regular assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra.

TRANS Nov 24

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Richard Burgin, as conductor of the next pair of Boston symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will introduce to Boston a composer of world renown, Nicholas Miaskovsky, conducting the Eighth Symphony of the Russian composer. Rudolph Ganz, the pianist, and former conductor of the St. Louis Symphony orchestra, will be the soloist at this pair of concerts.

CLEVELAND, OHIO

Praise Indeed

TRANS Nov 27

LONG able and fair-minded reviewer is the opera house and the concert-hall for the New York Times, Mr. Richard Aldrich returns occasionally to the practice of his calling. Last Saturday afternoon he listened to the concert in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; took pen in hand; wrote warmly of much that he had heard. His praise is the more significant since he belongs to an earlier musical generation than Mr. Koussevitzky's and to a different generation from that which most acclaims the conductor. After demur to Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" as composition, Mr. Aldrich proceeds:

Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a very crisp and brilliant performance, which would have been good enough for Mozart, if there had been anything remotely resembling Mozart in the score. The other modern pieces were Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," played in an extraordinarily beautiful poetic spirit and with all sorts of shimmering tonal half-lights and opalescences; and the somewhat overworked suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka." . . . Much of the latter, especially the second of the two divisions in which the suite is played, is, on the concert stage, unintelligible and tiresome in its repetitions. But Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with immense verve and gusto, made all its points, filled it full of effects that ought to have meant something if they had had anything outside of themselves to refer to. And there was much applause, to which the conductor made his men, here and elsewhere, rise and bow.

The performance of Brahms's Second Symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahms's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness' that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in its larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahms's thought.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Music Notes and Comments

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Passing . . Of Vincent B. Wheeler.

By HARVEY GAUL.

208

Celebrated Orchestra Conductors To Be Here This Season

From left to right above are Henry Verbrugghen of the Minneapolis Orchestra; Frederic Stock of the Chicago Orchestra; Arturo Toscanini of the New York Philharmonic, and Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra. Below from left to right are Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic, and Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony To Play This Week.

Serge Koussevitzky brings his brilliant Boston Symphony to open the orchestra association series. It is a tradition that he shall be the first and he is a worthy lead-off man.

Next Friday night the Mosque should be jammed by people who want distinguished music rendered in a distinguished manner. Mr. Koussevitzky has drawn up two of the best programs Pittsburgh has been offered. They are high in contrast and embrace many schools. They are excellent in taste and marvelous in their catholic appeal.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete Ballet" begins the concert. At one time Igor Stravinsky was considered an ultra modernist, but in these zig-zag days of cacophony, the ultra part is forgotten. The work will be found to be agreeable and the instrumentation enticing. This will be followed by Debussy's engaging nocturnes, "Nuages," and "Fetes," two impressions that are purple and mauve in Debussyian overtones. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersingers" will evoke a round of applause, and as often as this work is played—once a year at least—it is always welcome. The program will close with that Titan, Beethoven in the stunning "Eroica."

Good as is Friday's concert, that of Saturday afternoon is better. It opens with Serge Prokoffief's "Classical Symphony," which may be classical in title and perhaps in form, but we'll bet a whole tone scale to a book of half-tones that it becomes an adventure in contemporary discords.

Again does M. Debussy's faun sport himself in our sylvan midsts. It will be interesting to see the difference between Mr. Koussevitky's and Mr. Goosen's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune." They undoubtedly have different views as to how woodland folk should spend an afternoon. It is perhaps unfortunate that we should have the same work within a week, and perhaps it is most fortunate.

Following this comes Ravel's gorgeous excerpts from the ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." He was once the "enfant terrible" of French music, but since he has been sojourning in this country he has been found to be most mild mannered. These morceaux are rich in Ravel's ravellings.

The concert will close with Brahms' stupendous D major symphony, a work that would make any program.

The Boston Symphony deserves the best we can give them in the way of audiences. Programs like these seldom come in pairs.

* * *

Nov KOUSSEVITZKY— 28 BRUMMEL OF THE BATON

Mr. Koussevitzky, performing on the rostrum, possesses all the physical eloquence of a ballet master. Mordkin himself would appreciate the graceful sweeps of the Koussevitzky wrists. And other conductors who would acquire some of this conductor's facade might take to imitating his dress, for Mr. Koussevitzky is, without doubt, the best appareled man in music. As a visitor, he even threatens the laurels of New York City's mayor. None but a man deeply conscious of the elegancies of masculine garb would conceive of a collar which rises to such glorious heights above that part of Mr. Koussevitzky's coat which his audiences are privileged to observe.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducts the season's first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday night.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our unstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent. A vivid personality. And this imbues his readings. Every piece he sets before his hearers pulses with ardent life. Each one seems newly created. He summons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comments on the conductorless orchestra:

"A conductorless orchestra is a wonderful idea, which I really welcome, not because such an orchestra may play better, but because its members get used to brilliant discipline—through their own will, and accustom themselves to an assiduous and diligent work.

"And later, when these musicians play under a conductor, they facilitate his task, being a good material for the conductor-virtuoso. They understand much more easily his intentions and wishes."

Of course, the American Symphonic Ensemble is really not preparing for a conductor, if we may guess their intent. Speaking of the organization, it is interesting to know that it is a manifestation of the Communistic idea. Its famous progenitor of the American conductorless orchestra, the Persimphans Orchestra of Moscow, was organized in 1922 as an outgrowth of the Communistic glorification of the mass rather than of the individual. Its spectacular performances were immediately praised by such musicians as Glazounoff and Milhaud, and the career of the First Symphony Ensemble of Moscow was so successful that ensembles of the kind have been formed in five other cities in Russia, one in Leipzig and another in Berne, Switzerland.

CLEVELAND, OHIO

Praise Indeed TRANS NOV 27

LONG able and fair-minded reviewer is the opera house and the concert-hall for the New York Times, Mr. Richard Aldrich returns occasionally to the practice of his calling. Last Saturday afternoon he listened to the concert in New York of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; took pen in hand; wrote warmly of much that he had heard. His praise is the more significant since he belongs to an earlier musical generation than Mr. Koussevitzky's and to a different generation from that which most acclaims the conductor. After demur to Prokofiev's "Classical Symphony" as composition, Mr. Aldrich proceeds:

> Mr. Koussevitzky gave it a very crisp and brilliant performance, which would have been good enough for Mozart, if there had been anything remotely resembling Mozart in the score. The other modern pieces were Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," played in an extraordinarily beautiful poetic spirit and with all sorts of shimmering tonal half-lights and opalescences; and the somewhat overworked suite from Stravinsky's "Petrushka." . . . Much of the latter, especially the second of the two divisions in which the suite is played, is, on the concert stage, unintelligible and tiresome in its repetitions. But Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with immense verve and gusto, made all its points, filled it full of effects that ought to have meant something if they had had anything outside of themselves to refer to. And there was much applause, to which the conductor made his men, here and elsewhere, rise and bow.
>
> The performance of Brahms's Second Symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahms's orchestration is from the "muddiness" and "grayness' that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this color a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in its larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahms's thought.

PITTSBURG, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

208

Music Notes and Comments

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra—the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the Passing . . Of Vincent B. Wheeler.

By HARVEY GAUL.

Celebrated Orchestra Conductors To Be Here This Season

The Boston Symphony To Play This Week.

Serge Koussevitzky brings his brilliant Boston Symphony to open the orchestra association series. It is a tradition that he shall be the first and he is a worthy lead-off man.

Next Friday night the Mosque should be jammed by people who want distinguished music rendered in a distinguished manner. Mr. Koussevitzky has drawn up two of the best programs Pittsburgh has been offered. They are high in contrast and embrace many schools. They are excellent in taste and marvelous in their catholic appeal.

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete Ballet" begins the concert. At one time Igor Stravinsky was considered an ultra modernist. But in these zig-zag days of cacophony, the ultra part is forgotten. The work will be found to be agreeable and the instrumentation enticing. This will be followed by Debussy's engaging nocturnes, "Nuages," and "Fetes," two impressions that are purple and mauve in Debussyian overtones. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersingers" will evoke a round of applause, and as often as this work is played—once a year at least—it is always welcome. The program will close with that Titan, Beethoven in the stunning "Eroica."

Good as is Friday's concert, that of Saturday afternoon is better. It opens with Serge Prokoffief's "Classical Symphony," which may be classical in title and perhaps in form, but we'll bet a whole tone scale to a book of half-tones that it becomes an adventure in contemporary discords.

Again does M. Debussy's faun sport himself in our sylvan midsts It will be interesting to see the difference between Mr. Koussevitky's and Mr. Goosen's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune." They undoubtedly have different views as to how woodland folk should spend an afternoon. It is perhaps unfortunate that we should have the same work within a week, and perhaps it is most fortunate.

Following this comes Ravel's gorgeous excerpts from the ballet, "Daphnis et Chloe." He was once the "enfant terrible" of French music, but since he has been sojourning in this country he has been found to be most mild mannered. These morceaux are rich in Ravel's ravellings.

The concert will close with Brahms' stupendous D major symphony, a work that would make any program.

The Boston Symphony deserves the best we can give them in the way of audiences. Programs like these seldom come in pairs.

* * *

From left to right above are Henry Verbrugghen of the Minneapolis Orchestra; Frederic Stock of the Chicago Orchestra; Arturo Toscanini of the New York Philharmonic, and Nikolai Sokoloff of the Cleveland Orchestra. Below from left to right are Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic, and Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comments on the conductorless orchestra:

"A conductorless orchestra is a wonderful idea, which I really welcome, not because such an orchestra may play better, but because its members get used to brilliant discipline—through their own will, and accustom themselves to an assiduous and diligent work.

"And later, when these musicians play under a conductor, they facilitate his task, being a good material for the conductor-virtuoso. They understand much more easily his intentions and wishes."

Of course, the American Symphonic Ensemble is really not preparing for a conductor, if we may guess their intent Speaking of the organization, it is interesting to know that it is a manifestation of the Communistic idea. Its famous progenitor of the American conductorless orchestra, the Persimphans Orchestra of Moscow, was organized in 1922 as an outgrowth of the Communistic glorification of the mass rather than of the individual. Its spectacular performances were immediately praised by such musicians as Glazounoff and Milhaud, and the career of the First Symphony Ensemble of Moscow was so successful that ensembles of the kind have been formed in five other cities in Russia, one in Leipzig and another in Berne, Switzerland.

Nov 28

KOUSSEVITZKY— BRUMMEL OF THE BATON

Mr. Koussevitzky, performing on the rostrum, possesses all the physical eloquence of a ballet master. Mordkin himself would appreciate the graceful sweeps of the Koussevitzky wrists. And other conductors who would acquire some of this conductor's facade might take to imitating his dress, for Mr. Koussevitzky is, without doubt, the best appareled man in music. As a visitor, he even threatens the laurels of New York City's mayor. None but a man deeply conscious of the elegancies of masculine garb would conceive of a collar which rises to such glorious heights above that part of Mr. Koussevitzky's coat which his audiences are privileged to observe.

Mr. Koussevitzky conducts the season's first Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music next Friday night.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our unstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent. A vivid personality. And this imbues his readings. Every piece he sets before his hearers pulses with ardent life. Each one seems newly created. He summons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

209

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
NOV 1 1928

ARTISTIC UPLIFT TOTTERS ON THE RADIO

Announcement has been made that the Boston Symphony concerts will not be heard over the radio this winter. The reason given is that the Bostonian who made this possible did not receive a sufficient response from the public to justify the expendiure. In other words, it did not pay him.

It cost him $1,000 a concert for the privilege of broadcasting; he had to pay additional for the artists and the orchestra; he had to pay for extra equipment; and he had to pay royalties to various living composers whose compositions were played.

When the Boston Symphony concerts were started over the radio it was widely propagandized as a startling victory for a widespread dissemination of symphonic music, and the radio magnates did not fail to stress this supposition heavily. They were going to do more for public appreciation of the finest flower of a fine art than all the concert platforms had done for it in generations. The public was going to be educated and uplifted almost over night.

But here we find that the Boston Symphony is no longer going on the air; and the house of cards, it seems to us, falls with one of those dull thuds we read about.

The reason is simple. Commercial radio must, if successful to its commercial sponsors, appeal to the widest possible circle of listeners. Manifestly a symphony cannot do that. Neither can any other high grade concert. The moment a "sponsor" tries to get the attention of the public over the radio he is in duty bound —if careful of returns—to appeal to the largest possible audience he can get. If he is wide awake he discovers that the way to do this is to sponsor what the largest number desire; and never in the history of the world has this been other than what they can understand and appreciate.

Take for instance a widely heralded "half-hour" of music, "bought and paid for" by a prominent manufacturer some months ago. He began with a marvelous program—employed a big orchestra, a large battery of singers, a noted conductor. This went on for about a month. Then the programs changed; in other words, they were cheapened. And the suave announcer asked the radio listeners to write in to tell how much they appreciated the change in the style of programs. A few music fans probably wrote in that they had become terrible; but it is safe to say there were ten times as many who said "that's the stuff; give us what we want."

In order to get hold of the crowds commercial radio of necessity must appeal to the popular and superficially pleasing type of performance, so far as music is concerned. The radio sponsor is in the same position as the producer of a show designed to have a wide popular appeal—he cannot do so with the production of grand opera or symphony concerts. He must bow to the average in his audience.

Of course, there are high grade musical offerings over the air in spite of the handicaps mentioned. Analysis, however, shows that nearly all of these come after the commercial attractions have pre-empted the best evening hours. If one wishes to remain up late one can hear fine music—even tabloid grand opera—sponsored by the radio broadcasters themselves. These gentlemen do not need to worry about direct financial returns from their audiences and can afford to practice uplift. The chain magnates do all they can to raise the level of broadcasting; but of course, they cannot control the desires of the others who buy time. It is not a bread and butter proposition with the chain magnates; it is with the commercial time-buyers.

All of which is not to be construed as a severe criticism of the radio art as a whole. If the greatest pleasure to the greatest number is the criterion then it has succeeded mightily. But one cannot help making sundry doelful observations when one discovers that the top-line attraction talked about has been ditched for what amounts to "want of public support." The radio must have the public support or, commercially, it cannot survive. And that's one reason why there are so many jazz orchestras on the air.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
[redacted]
Dispatch
NOV 1 - 1928

WINS FAME AS 'BULL FIDDLER;' WILL DIRECT BOSTON CONCERT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who rose to fame via the "bull fiddle," is in Columbus to conduct the famous Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Memorial hall, Thursday at 8:15 p. m.

With his array of 110 musicians, the celebrated leader of orchestras arrived in Columbus at 1 p. m. from Cleveland on a special train which is carrying the band on its one week and only tour away from Boston. Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are guests of the Deshler Wallick hotel.

the monster of violins, into submission at the Moscow conservatory of music. So efficient did he become that he ventured on the concert stage at an early age. Last week, in Carnegie hall, New York, the virtuoso played the first double bass concert America has ever heard. Gotham's critics were nonplussed at the unbelievably sweet music the master produced on this "grunter among instruments."

Koussevitzky's first appearance in Columbus during his career in America and the Boston orches- in 16 years, is being by the Symphony Club l Ohio.

PLAIN-DEALER
CLEVELAND, O.
NOV 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY CHARMS AUDIENCE

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our unstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent. A vivid personality. And this imbues his readings. Every piece he sets before his hearers pulses with ardent life. Each one seems newly created. He summons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 1 - 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Frank A. Sedgwick is offering the Boston Symphony tick ts at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised, which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitzky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program. He astonished New York a week ago with his double-bass debut recital, of which Laurence Gilman, New York Tribune, says:

"Shortly before an audience of celebrities and a few others ceased streaming down the aisles of Carnegie hall, Tuesday night, Serge Koussevitzky, unchaperoned by his Boston Symphony orchestra, walked a bit nervously across the stage and took his place to windward of an accompanist's grand piano. To Mr. Koussevitzky must go the distinction of having added a new and exciting pleasure to the possible experience of our music lovers. He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar (where Cecil Forsyth has warned us not to stable him forever), and has revealed [illegible] a creature

COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
NOV 2 - 1928

Boston Symphony, in Master's Hands, Makes Musical Holiday That Will Live in Memories

BY KARL B. PAULY.

For the first time in 16 years Columbus Thursday night heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and thrilled to its performance under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who in those intervening years has come out of the east to drench the western world with his musical eloquence.

It was an event of the first magnitude in the city's musical history and Memorial Hall was virtually filled for the occasion. M. Koussevitzky's appearance was the signal for an ovation in which the audience rose and applauded for nearly a minute.

The great conductor, leader of orchestras in Moscow and Petrograd, first conductor of the Russian State orchestra under the Soviet regime, and still annually conductor of orchestras in London and Paris, ruled the 110-piece symphony orchestra with vigor and yet with restraint.

Always he seemed to hold the power of the orchestra between the thumb and forefinger of his left hand as he drew from them with the baton in his right that great wealth of tonal color. The orchestra responded as one man to his least gesture.

Two of the numbers presented Thursday night never before had been played in Columbus. These were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

The first of these seemed not the complicated thing of which the laity stands in awe but an understandable work of art built up, developed and embellished before one's eyes, so to speak. Indeed, in its playing Thursday night, the audience heard it presented under the direction of one of Prokofieff's particular champions, M. Koussevitzky.

Early in the allegro movement it was easy to see why some critics have said that "the composer's idea in this symphony was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." There were moments particularly reminiscent of the great composer.

The first violins, predominant in the allegro, recurred again in episodes in the larghetto movement, and were joined in the gavotta by the wood-winds and eventually the violincellos and double basses, working toward the splendid finale.

In this work, if not earlier, it was apparent how large a part of M. Koussevitzky's distinction as a virtuoso of the double bass plays in his handling of the great orchestra.

It is probable that nothing so tremendously magnificent has ever been heard in Columbus as the tumultuous close of "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

At the outset the Ravel number is exquisite and bizarre. Throughout it is coursed with pathos and fervence. It is idyllic at the point at which Daphnis fashions a flute and plays a melancholy tune, to which Chloe, appearing later, dances in imitation.

In the joyous tumult of the finale are massed the orchestra's full brass complement, together with kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, tambourines, harp and double basses with the low C. There is a veritable blizzard of strings, punctured with cymbalic crashes and the whipping of other strings.

The number was the most impassioned on Thursday evening's program, approached only by the last movement of the Brahms symphony.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
[redacted]
Dispatch
NOV [illegible]

Symphony Club Opens Season with Close to Capacity House.

By H. E. Cherrington.

COLUMBUS is loosening up its purse-strings for music. Here the Music club starts off with a huge house for Jeritza in mid-October; Mr. O'Leary sets new house records for Kreisler and Galli-Curci; the opera has sufficient guarantors for the spring; Capital's and the chamber music courses are well started. And then comes the Symphony Club of Central Ohio with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and very nearly fills the hall. That, too, on the eve of a week-end of expensive football and celebration.

The [illegible] at Me- [illegible] t of the [illegible] h series, [illegible] lled, by [illegible] ts from [illegible] ballet; we may by the [illegible] ozartian [illegible] y. Opus [illegible] played in varying measures with the opening Beethoven overture and the concluding Brahms.

Koussevitzky's entrance is dramatic. He walks like one born to command and he conducts in the same way. There is at times austerity about his manner and at times a hint of romanticism, and yet, withal, it is marked by simplicity, a simplicity that sometimes even ignores continuance of the beat in passages that are purely transitional or elementary. We like him, which means the present writer and thousands of hearers. In fact, he easily wins his place in the ranks of the three or four leading conductors whom America has seen in this decade.

The overture to "Leonore," No. 3, marked by the twice-repeated trumpet calls off-stage, was beautifully played. It gave an auspicious start to the program. Then came the "Classical" symphony by the contemporaneous Russian, Prokofieff, something molded much more in the older forms than most of his product. It has a delightful opening movement, graceful and well scored by this composer 11 years ago, when he was but 26 years of age. On that work alone he could base a considerable reputation. The airy delicacy of the larghetto and the even working out of the two other measures make for a harmonious ensemble, from the composer's standpoint. The movements are short and the whole is a sort of symphony in miniature, a well chiseled bit of orchestral bric-a-brac.

"DAPHNIS AND CHLOE."

The composition that set the audience into a tumult of enthusiasm, however, was the one that immediately preceded the intermission. This was the three orchestral fragments from the second series from Maurice Ravel's one-act ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which Diaghileff and others have done with such great success. The first part was an exquisite pastoral, in which a flute solo of ravishing clarity of tone was played—we suppose by G. Laurent. Later there were spread upon the canvas broad splashes from the conductor's brush, drawn from a lavish palette of orchestral color. Some of these sweeping bits of virtuosity, ending with glissandi on the harps, and again bits of vibrato that seemed to shake the whole orchestra, were spine-chilling. It was one of the most glowing performances of a modern orchestral work ever done in this fair city.

BRAHMS' D MAJOR.

The Brahms D major symphony, his No. 2, has been done here by at least one other orchestra, though we can't recall which one. It has much of interest and it was well, if not ideally, played. But it seemed a bit dull after Ravel, even considering the difference in their moods and modes.

The Boston orchestra is a glorious organization of 110 men. Imagine the results one can obtain, for examples, with a score and half of violins, more than a dozen violas, ten cellos and ten basses, on which Koussevitzky plays with such skill as soloist. Strings, brass, woods, percussion, all are well chosen. After such artistry, we can only applaud and long for a return engagement.

209

HERALD
NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
NOV 1 1928

ARTISTIC UPLIFT TOTTERS ON THE RADIO

Announcement has been made that the Boston Symphony concerts will not be heard over the radio this winter. The reason given is that the Bostonian who made this possible did not receive a sufficient response from the public to justify the expendiure. In other words, it did not pay him.

It cost him $1,000 a concert for the privilege of broadcasting; he had to pay additional for the artists and the orchestra; he had to pay for extra equipment; and he had to pay royalties to various living composers whose compositions were played.

When the Boston Symphony concerts were started over the radio it was widely propagandized as a startling victory for a widespread dissemination of symphonic music, and the radio magnates did not fail to stress this supposition heavily. They were going to do more for public appreciation of the finest flower of a fine art than all the concert platforms had done for it in generations. The public was going to be educated and uplifted almost over night.

But here we find that the Boston Symphony is no longer going on the air; and the house of cards, it seems to us, falls with one of those dull thuds we read about.

The reason is simple. Commercial radio must, if successful to its commercial sponsors, appeal to the widest possible circle of listeners. Manifestly a symphony cannot do that. Neither can any other high grade concert. The moment a "sponsor" tries to get the attention of the public over the radio he is in duty bound—if careful of returns—to appeal to the largest possible audience he can get. If he is wide awake he discovers that the way to do this is to sponsor what the largest number desire; and never in the history of the world has this been other than what they can understand and appreciate.

Take for instance a widely heralded "half-hour" of music, "bought and paid for" by a prominent manufacturer some months ago. He began with a marvelous program—employed a big orchestra, a large battery of singers, a noted conductor. This went on for about a month. Then the programs changed; in other words, they were cheapened. And the suave announcer asked the radio listeners to write in to tell how much they appreciated the change in the style of programs. A few music fans probably wrote in that they had become terrible; but it is safe to say there were ten times as many who said "that's the stuff; give us what we want."

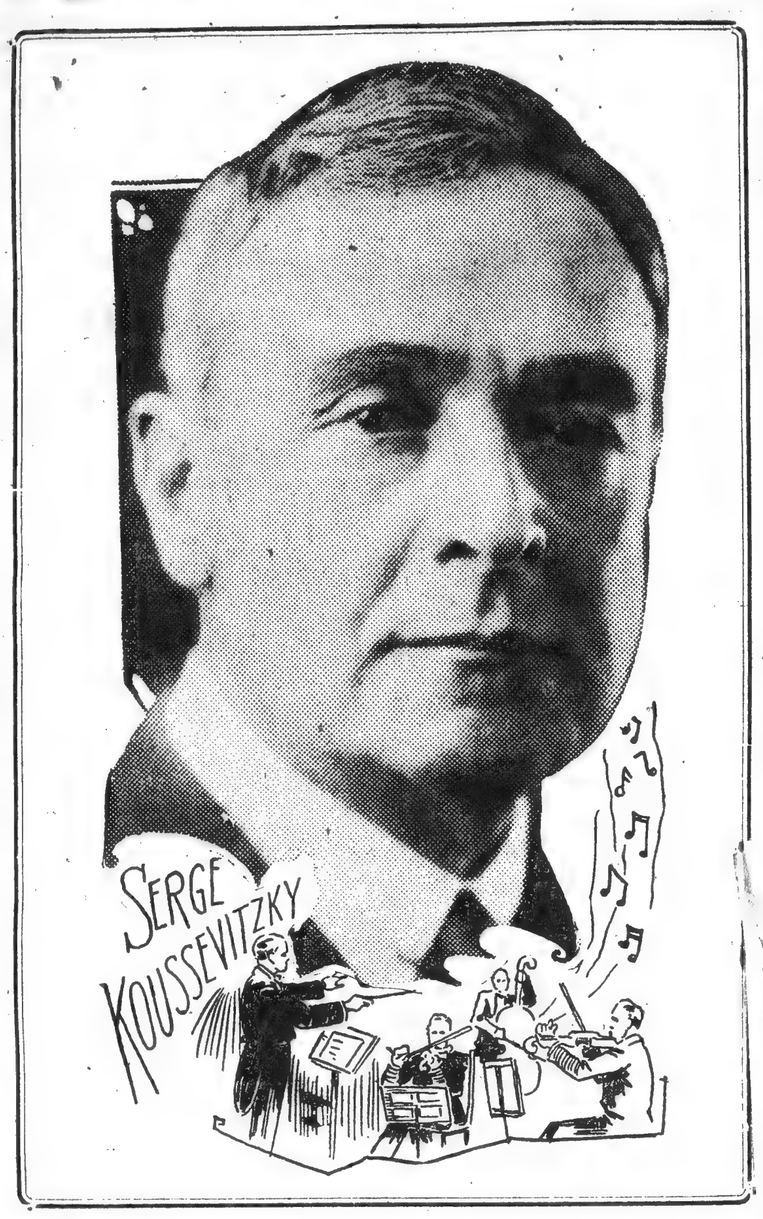
In order to get hold of the crowds commercial radio of necessity must appeal to the popular and superficially pleasing type of performance, so far as music is concerned. The radio sponsor is in the same position as the producer of a show designed to have a wide popular appeal—he cannot do so with the production of grand opera or symphony concerts. He must bow to the average in his audience.

Of course, there are high grade musical offerings over the air in spite of the handicaps mentioned. Analysis, however, shows that nearly all of these come after the commercial attractions have pre-empted the best evening hours. If one wishes to remain up late one can hear fine music—even tabloid grand opera—sponsored by the radio broadcasters themselves. These gentlemen do not need to worry about direct financial returns from their audiences and can afford to practice uplift. The chain magnates do all they can to raise the level of broadcasting; but of course, they cannot control the desires of the others who buy time. It is not a bread and butter proposition with the chain magnates; it is with the commercial time-buyers.

All of which is not to be construed as a severe criticism of the radio art as a whole. If the greatest pleasure to the greatest number is the criterion then it has succeeded mightily. But one cannot help making sundry doelful observations when one discovers that the top-line attraction talked about has been ditched for what amounts to "want of public support." The radio must have the public support or, commercially, it cannot survive. And that's one reason why there are so many jazz orchestras on the air.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
[redacted]
Dispatch
NOV 1 1928

WINS FAME AS 'BULL FIDDLER;' WILL DIRECT BOSTON CONCERT



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who rose to fame via the "bull fiddle," is in Columbus to conduct the famous Boston Symphony orchestra concert in Memorial hall, Thursday at 8:15 p. m.

With his array of 110 musicians, the celebrated leader of orchestras arrived in Columbus at 1 p. m. from Cleveland on a special train which is carrying the band on its one week and only tour away from Boston. Koussevitzky and the management of the orchestra are guests of the Deshler Wallick hotel.

At the age of 14 young Serge began to battle the double bass, the monster of violins, into submission at the Moscow conservatory of music. So efficient did he become that he ventured on the concert stage at an early age. Last week, in Carnegie hall, New York, the virtuoso played the first double bass concert America has ever heard. Gotham's critics were nonplussed at the unbelievably sweet music the master produced on this "grunter among instruments."

Koussevitzky's first appearance in Columbus during his career in America and the Boston orchestra's first in 16 years, is being sponsored by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

CHARMS AUDIENCE

Orchestra of 110 Swayed by Dynamic Baton of Koussevitzky.

BY JAMES H. ROGERS.

A concert of many thrills and many artistic delights was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Masonic Auditorium. And Serge Koussevitzky, leader of this great company of players—great in more senses than one, for it numbers 110 performers—was the hero of one of the most exhilarating musical evenings that memory recalls.

To begin with, this is a magnificent orchestra, of outstanding excellence in all its sections. In balance and blend of tone, in splendor of volume, in swift and pliant response to the demands of their conductor, in a word, in all orchestral virtues, the Bostonians compel our unstinted admiration. We heard the Boston Orchestra redivivus, after a period of sackcloth and ashes. And that was not an unpleasant thing to think about, either.

Mr. Koussevitzky possesses a marvelous control over his musicians. An autocrat, maybe. But, I believe, a benevolent despot, winning his men by imparting to them his own enthusiasm, which is plainly apparent.

[illegible]ersonality. And this imbues [illegible]s. Every piece he sets be[illegible]earers pulses with ardent [illegible] one seems newly created. [illegible]ons an astonishing dynamic range from his players.

Watches Delicate Phases.

In this the more delicate phases are far from coming off second best. This was exemplified in the opening item of the program, the "Classical" symphony of the Russian, Prokokieff. The quotation marks are the composer's own. I think he wrote them down with the tongue in the cheek, and a twinkle in the eye. New stuff, from the fearsome music workshops of Moscow.

And behold the Bolshevist decked out in the costume of olden days at Versailles, perruque, snuff box and all. Prokokieff has gone back to the French clavecinists, Rameau, Couperin and the rest, for his models. One cannot say that he has beaten them at their own game; but he has not lagged far behind them.

This is delicious music, sparkling with gayety and animation. It was played with an airiness and a crisp and light precision that made it quite enchanting. And at the close of the symphony—which is really a suite of four short pieces—the listeners were all smiling broadly. Which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough.

Lovely Rendition.

To the Prokokieff work succeeded Debussy's familiar "Afternoon of a Faun," which was accorded a lovely and expressive rendition. And after this there were some excerpts from Ravel's ballet, "Daphne and Chloe." An exciting, breath-taking affair this performance was, too. Indeed, a tour de force of overwhelming brilliancy. A tempest of hand-clapping followed it.

The concert closed with the Brahms second symphony, with which, it strikes me, it would have been better to begin the program. However, it was beautifully played, and authoritatively played, too. Not exactly in the manner we are used too, now and then. Mr. Koussevitzky goes his own way. He gives us the composer plus a bit of Koussevitzky, greatly, to my notion, adding to the hearer's interest in the music under way.

The audience was only of moderate size, which, when we consider the attraction offered, was rather discouraging to the friends of music present. It is to be hoped that the extreme cordiality and the manifest pleasure of the listeners caused Mr. Koussevitzky to overlook the relative smallness of their numbers.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 1 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Frank A. Sedgwick is offering the Boston Symphony tick ts at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised, which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitzky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program. He astonished New York a week ago with his double-bass debut recital, of which Laurence Gilman, New York Tribune, says:

"Shortly before an audience of celebrities and a few others ceased streaming down the aisles of Carnegie hall, Tuesday night, Serge Koussevitzky, unchaperoned by his Boston Symphony orchestra, walked a bit nervously across the stage and took his place to windward of an accompanist's grand piano. To Mr. Koussevitzky must go the distinction of having added a new and exciting pleasure to the possible experience of our music lovers. He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar (where Cecil Forsyth has warned us not to stable him forever), and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude."

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

[illegible]-3,561,8

COTTON.

NEW YORK, Nov. 1.—(AP)—F[illegible] tures closed steady 2 to 8 poin[illegible] higher; December 19.35-36; Janua[illegible] 19.32-33c; March 19.30-31c; M[illegible] 19.22-23c; July 19.03. Spot stead[illegible]

Th

BY KARL B. PAULY.

For the first time in 16 years Columbus Thursday night heard the Boston Symphony orchestra and thrilled to its performance under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, who in those intervening years has come out of the east to drench the western world with his musical eloquence.

It was an event of the first magnitude in the city's musical history and Memorial Hall was virtually filled for the occasion. M. Koussevitzky's appearance was the signal for an ovation in which the audience rose and applauded for nearly a minute.

The great conductor, leader of orchestras in Moscow and Petrograd, first conductor of the Russian State orchestra under the Soviet regime, and still annually conductor of orchestras in London and Paris, ruled the 110-piece symphony orchestra with vigor and yet with restraint.

Always he seemed to hold the power of the orchestra between the thumb and forefinger of his left hand as he drew from them with the baton in his right that great wealth of tonal color. The orchestra responded as one man to his least gesture.

Two of the numbers presented Thursday night never before had been played in Columbus. These were Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, and excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

The first of these seemed not the complicated thing of which the laity stands in awe but an understandable work of art built up, developed and embellished before one's eyes, so to speak. Indeed, in its playing Thursday night, the audience heard it presented under the direction of one of Prokofieff's particular champions, M. Koussevitzky.

Early in the allegro movement it was easy to see why some critics have said that "the composer's idea in this symphony was to catch the spirit of Mozart and to put down that which, if he were living now, Mozart might put into his scores." There were moments particularly reminiscent of the great composer.

The first violins, predominant in the allegro, recurred again in episodes in the larghetto movement, and were joined in the gavotta by the wood-winds and eventually the violincellos and double basses, working toward the splendid finale.

In this work, if not earlier, it was apparent how large a part of M. Koussevitzky's distinction as a virtuoso of the double bass plays in his handling of the great orchestra.

It is probable that nothing so tremendously magnificent has ever been heard in Columbus as the tumultuous close of "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet.

At the outset the Ravel number is exquisite and bizarre. Throughout it is coursed with pathos and fervence. It is idyllic at the point at which Daphnis fashions a flute and plays a melancholy tune, to which Chloe, appearing later, dances in imitation.

In the joyous tumult of the finale are massed the orchestra's full brass complement, together with kettledrums, bass drum, cymbals, tambourines, harp and double basses with the low C. There is a veritable blizzard of strings, punctured with cymbalic crashes and the whipping of other strings.

The number was the most impassioned on Thursday evening's program, approached only by the last movement of the Brahms symphony.

COLUMBUS, OHIO
[redacted]
News Dispatch

Symphony Club Opens Season with Close to Capacity House.

By H. E. Cherrington.

COLUMBUS is loosening up its purse-strings for music. Here the Music club starts off with a huge house for Jeritza in mid-October; Mr. O'Leary sets new house records for Kreisler and Galli-Curci; the opera has sufficient guarantors for the spring; Capital's and the chamber music courses are well started. And then comes the Symphony Club of Central Ohio with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, and very nearly fills the hall. That, too, on the eve of a week-end of expensive football and celebration.

The audience last night at Memorial hall, hearing one unit of the Boston orchestra's forty-eighth series, was thrilled, genuinely thrilled, by the performance of excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet; surprised and delighted (if we may judge from frequent remarks) by the Prokofieff excursion into Mozartian classicism with his Symphony, Opus 25, and pleased in varying measures with the opening Beethoven overture and the concluding Brahms.

Koussevitzky's entrance is dramatic. He walks like one born to command and he conducts in the same way. There is at times austerity about his manner and at times a hint of romanticism, and yet, withal, it is marked by simplicity, a simplicity that sometimes even ignores continuance of the beat in passages that are purely transitional or elementary. We like him, which means the present writer and thousands of hearers. In fact, he easily wins his place in the ranks of the three or four leading conductors whom America has seen in this decade.

The overture to "Leonore," No. 3, marked by the twice-repeated trumpet calls off-stage, was beautifully played. It gave an auspicious start to the program. Then came the "Classical" symphony by the contemporaneous Russian, Prokofieff, something molded much more in the older forms than most of his product. It has a delightful opening movement, graceful and well scored by this composer 11 years ago, when he was but 26 years of age. On that work alone he could base a considerable reputation. The airy delicacy of the larghetto and the even working out of the two other measures make for a harmonious ensemble, from the composer's standpoint. The movements are short and the whole is a sort of symphony in miniature, a well chiseled bit of orchestral bric-a-brac.

"DAPHNIS AND CHLOE."

The composition that set the audience into a tumult of enthusiasm, however, was the one that immediately preceded the intermission. This was the three orchestral fragments from the second series from Maurice Ravel's one-act ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe," which Diaghileff and others have done with such great success. The first part was an exquisite pastoral, in which a flute solo of ravishing clarity of tone was played—we suppose by G. Laurent. Later there were spread upon the canvas broad splashes from the conductor's brush, drawn from a lavish palette of orchestral color. Some of these sweeping bits of virtuosity, ending with glissandi on the harps, and again bits of vibrato that seemed to shake the whole orchestra, were spine-chilling. It was one of the most glowing performances of a modern orchestral work ever done in this fair city.

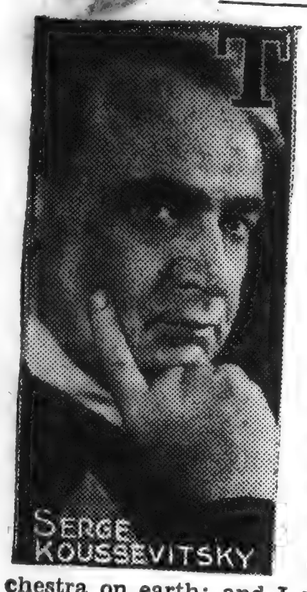
BRAHMS' D MAJOR.

The Brahms D major symphony, his No. 2, has been done here by at least one other orchestra, though we can't recall which one. It has much of interest and it was well, if not ideally, played. But it seemed a bit dull after Ravel, even considering the difference in their moods and modes.

The Boston orchestra is a glorious organization of 110 men. Imagine the results one can obtain, for examples, with a score and half of violins, more than a dozen violas, ten cellos and ten basses, on which Koussevitzky plays with such skill as soloist. Strings, brass, woods, percussion, all are well chosen. After such artistry, we can only applaud and long for a return engagement.

NEWS
NOV 2 - 1928

Symphony Orchestra, With Koussevitzky, Score Success



HERE'S truth as well as poetry in "music lends enchantment." It is possible for music to be so beautiful that an entire audience feels the spell and falls under the influence. It was demonstrated at Masonic hall Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Cleveland after an absence of ten years and played a program under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Probably most of us have heard that the Boston orchestra has deteriorated since those ante-bellum days when Karl Muck held the baton. Well, we know now that any such statement is a malicious lie or an error in judgment. Under Koussevitzky, it remains the same marvelous ensemble. To me it is the best symphony orchestra on earth; and I say this, comparing it to most of the famous ones in this country and in Europe. It seems to be one wonderful instrument from which come tones such as no other orchestra seems to produce. Strings superb, but so are the woodwinds and brasses. A sublime aggregation of virtuosity. And when this huge instrument of 110 pieces sits around the platform on which stands a genius of a conductor, like Koussevitzky, the result may be imagined by all who were not present last evening. It was one of those musical events beside which one puts a mark to prompt the memory as the fog of time comes on.

I think I never have heard such an enthusiastic outburst of praise as followed the first and second part of this symphony concert. The lobby fairly echoed from the comments of approval.

And there was a large crowd to hear and to praise. I noticed a few vacant seats, but not many. The auditorium was filled with music lovers who knew that they were hearing music rendered as well as it can be by human powers.

* * *

ONE may agree or disagree with M. Koussevitzky's readings. Some of them seem to be a bit "individual." But one may not doubt that he accomplishes exactly the thing that he wants to accomplish with the instrumentalists.

For example, I though his "Afternoon of a Faune" was rather slow in tempo. I have seen it danced in Paris, heard it played by many conductors; and never so slow before. But the effect was gorgeous in color and very beautiful.

His Prokofieff "Classical" symphony was played here for the first time. A work that might be called pretty, and without any of the "modernisms" that we sometimes expect from this composer. It seemed not a notable composition; but a most comfortable piece to hear, almost like a Mozart symphony, so far as melodies go.

The orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" were wonderfully well presented. One rarely hears such a perfect melodic representation of a pagan dance—and of romantic love. Ravel rises in one's estimation, after hearing Koussevitzky reveal his work.

The second part of the program was devoted to Brahms' second symphony—one of the familiar works on its scale of modern musical literature. And with this, the conductor again was penetrating and revealing; both of himself and of Brahms. It was a masterpiece of conducting and of playing.

It is to be hoped that the Bostonians will put us back on the list of "cities visited each year" and keep us there.

* * *

THEY gave DeWolf Hopper a banquet to celebrate his fiftieth anniversary as an actor. One of the speakers toasted "the greatest husband of them all" and a telegram came from Edna Wallace Hopper saying: "Heartiest congratulations from one of your wives and one who ought to know."

* * *

CERTAINLY, there are droll happenings in New York. Now they will give a Duncan festival at the Manhattan Opera house in memory of Isadora Duncan, the dancer. Last time Isadora was in America, she was snubbed, left and right, unappreciated, almost ignored as an artist, and a politician was quoted as saying: "That woman should never be allowed to return to America." It happens that "that woman" was a great-granddaughter of a soldier of the revolutionary war!

* * *

LAST winter we heard reports of the remarkable singing of the Russian Kedroff quartet. Later the Women's City club brought the quartet to Cleveland; and the vocalists lived up to the praise that had been lavished upon them in the east. The Women's City club is bringing them back for a concert Nov. 17. . . . The Fortnightly Musical club will present Severin Eisenberger in a piano recital at Hotel Statler the evening of Nov. 7. . . . Edwin Arthur Kraft will give an organ recital at Trinity cathedral next Monday evening. . . . The Stratford Players, booked for an engagement later in the season at the Hanna theater, are scheduled to give a performance of "Julius Caesar" at Glenville auditorium this evening, under the auspices of the Drama club.

* * *

CHANGES in some of the vaudeville-film house programs take place today: Billy Dess and company share topline honors with Kelly and Jackson in "Oh May" at the Park theater. The Victoria troupe features a brass band on wheels. Others: Jean Granese, and Cowan and Gray. The film is "Beggars of Life."

Jimmy Lucas in "Vampire and Fool of 1928" is topliner at Keith's 105th theater, assisted by Geraldine Herbert. Others: the Wyoming Four, Paulo, Paquita and Chiquita, the Nevines, Gordon and company and Adelaide Nelson and her baby elephants. Film: "Win That Girl."

Five acts of vaudeville are offered, commencing today at Loew's Granada, the program topped by the Royal Welsh Gleeman and including O'Dunn and Day, Palermo's Canines, Marcus Berta and Abbot and Bisland in "A Night at a Night Club." Film: "The Patent Leather Kid."

* * *

SEVERAL inquiries have been received in regard to that excellent actor, A. E. Matthews in "Interference" at the Ohio. Yes, he has appeared here before—several times, I believe. Last time with Ina Claire in "The Last of Mrs. Cheney." He is as much at home on the London stage as in the American theater, having appeared over there frequently in American plays and this side in English plays. He is an Englishman by birth.

PRESS

Boston Symphony Opens Season, Here

Initial Event of Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's Thirteenth Year Gala Occasion. Koussevitsky and His Men Given Cordial Reception in Syria Mosque. Beethoven's "Eroica" Proves Gem of Evening—Debussy Pleases.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL.
Press Music Critic.

REGARDLESS of the number of times one has heard Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, always new beauties, hitherto unsuspected, unfold themselves to the listener. And always one can count on an orchestra like the Boston Symphony—which opened the thirteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's concerts in Syria mosque last night—to give just the right touch to the master composer's work. Especially so under the inspiring direction of such a conductor as Serge Koussevitzky.

It was something of a gala event, this initial concert of the new season. One might speak of the throng that filled the greater part of the mosque; of the brilliant audience in which wealth mingled and rubbed shoulders with the struggling student, but it was the music that occupied the place of honor, and it is of the music we will speak.

Judging by the cordial reception accorded both conductor and players, the program was enjoyed to the fullest extent. Opening with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete, Ballet"—a series of sketchy, sometimes eerie, numbers—it proceeded to Debussy. Followed Wagner's "Prelude to the Mastersingers," and then the greatest number of all, the Beethoven Symphony.

* * *

IN the Stravinsky offering, scored for stringed instruments, one encounters varied moods—sometimes dreamy, sometimes hazy—with the peculiarly baffling cadences that leave us in doubt as to whether there is more to come. There are expressive incidental soli for different members of the string family, but some rather wide gaps, three or four octaves apart, lead one to wonder just what impression the composer meant to convey. As a whole, though, the music is, after all, satisfying, with its rapidly changing gallimaufry, keeping the listener keyed up to the height of expectancy that sometimes fails to altogether materialize. Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from the Stravinsky all that was in it, with his splendid body of players.

Debussy was rather more satisfying in his nocturns, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The wood wind and stringed ensemble kept up a continual badinage, the cold quality of the lower tones in the first named section being dissipated by the genial warmth of the strings, in answer, during the "Clouds" number, which was real "tone painting." In the second there is a particularly lovely melody for solo viola. Effective combinations in harp and flute lent a charming color to this number, one of the most entrancing on the program.

* * *

WAGNER'S overture, leading off with that great C chord, is based on the principal themes in the opera from which it takes its name, and introduces about all the devices to be found in the modern orchestra, up 'till within a few years ago at least. It has been given here so often that everybody is tolerably familiar with the general character of the music which, in spots, verges upon the ironic. The more tone you get out of the orchestra the better goes the overture, it seems, and the Boston Symphony went at it, hammer and tongs, and tympani and brass, to be sure, which made for a rather glowing performance.

After that, what a relief to listen to the Beethoven, especially as played by this orchestra. The first movement, "Allegro con brio," was given with a verve that would have delighted the composer himself. Mr. Koussevitzky never forces his players, but never allows things to lag either, and the well balanced ensemble was pleasing. The "Marcia funebre" was given a reading that did not overlook any of the essentials in this quite lengthy movement.

As for the "Scherzo," it reminded one of a terrific downpour of rain on the roof, with the biting staccato of the strings, and the vivacious repartee between these and the wood winds. Outstanding features, to me, were the wonderfully effective playing of the horns in that haunting woodland refrain and the compelling answer from the strings, with changes of rhythm that foreshadowed Brahms. The finale—part of the wind

NEW YORK
NEW YORKER

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
NOV

Prominent Folk Attend BostonSymphonyConcert

Miss Elizabeth McCullough Is Introduced At Afternoon Function—Weddings and Betrothals Made Known.

SMART society formed a capacity audience last night in Syria mosque to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. Many distinguished guests were present among whom was Mrs. Robert Goheen, of Vengurla, India, daughter of Sir James Ewing who was knighted by the English government for service in India. Mrs. Goheen has been a resident of India practically all her life and is the wife of one of the leading surgeons of a missionary hospital in India. She was a guest in the box of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson. The latter wore a silver gray evening wrap topped with a huge fox collar of blending hue. Other guests in the Clemson box were Mr. and Mrs. John G. Clemson of Los Angeles. Mrs. Clemson was strikingly attractive in her wrap of ermine with fox collar. Her hair of silver added to her perfect ensemble. Mr. and Mrs. Hallock Sherard were also guests of the Clemson's and Mrs. Sherard wore a gown of heavy satin of a rose-pink shade. Mrs. Goheen wore a gold metallic wrap with sable trimmed collar and cuff effect.

Others present were Mrs. W. C. Dierks of Edgewood, who wore a black lace gown. Miss Jane McEldowney was seen wearing an apple green taffeta frock, and her sister, Mrs. Walters, wore a black net creation. Miss Elizabeth Hogue was in company with Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson of Baird st. Miss Hogue was wearing a black velvet wrap with huge white fox collar and Mrs. Wilson wore a semi-formal gown of a gold metallic and brown combination. Dr. and Mrs. C. W. Morton were also entertaining in their box. Mrs. Morton was attired in a peach colored gown with sequined bodice.

Other boxholders for last night's concert were: Mrs. Charles Bruckman, John F. Casey, Mrs. Donald G. Clark, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Dr. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. L. Girard Firth, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. William H. Hall, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. Roy A. Hunt, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mrs. J. E. Lewis.

and the Muses); Variation of Polymnia; Variation of Terpsichore; Variation of Apollo; Apollo and Terpsichore; Coda (Apollo and the Muses); Apotheosis.

Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages; (b) Fetes.

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo; Ollegro vivace; Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

As customary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened our Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's concerts in Syria Mosque, and once again set standards that will be hard to approach. One may well regret the vacant places at these concerts, for nowhere else in the world is one privileged to hear such music.

Interest at first centered about a new Stravinsky work, ballet music for strings alone, and music that always will remind us of the fine quality of Boston's violins, seldom of Stravinsky. If the dancing was only passable, when the ballet was produced in Paris, it is no wonder the audience paid little attention to the orchestra. It is only momentarily interesting, lacks all richness that one hears in the Bach concertos for string orchestra, and makes us suspect that Stravinsky makes more colorful instrumentation than musical designs.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" are old acquaintances here, but never have we heard them more delicately played. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude was a fine climax for the first part of the program; for once all the voices could be heard, for the Boston soloists, the French horns and English horns, the rest of the woodwinds, are virtuosos. But Koussevitsky played them a bit too strongly last evening and lost the main line of the prelude. It was too analytical; it moved heavily.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, however, showed Koussevitsky at his very best. There were no heroics in imitation of Italian or Dutch conductors; there was merely straightforward classic reading of a magnificent score, and played by America's most representative orchestra.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THE NEW YORKER

MUSICAL EVENTS

A Double Bass Says "Uncle"—Recitals Sans Casualties—This Symphonic Jazz Age

ALMOST all of the orchestra conductors were at one time solo instrumentalists, but most of them have put their virtuoso careers behind them. Mr. Mengelberg occasionally directs from a pseudo-harpsichord, and Mr. Damrosch illustrates his lectures with a bit of piano-playing, but up to last week Mr. Gabrilowitsch was the only licensed director whose solo performances were something more than excursions from his regular business. Mr. Stokowski used to be an organist, but he has not been heard here in that capacity since his early days. I never heard him perform during his term of service at a New York church, but I have learned from a gentleman who directed many funerals in the Stokowski régime that few organists of his acquaintance were so helpful.

This, as you may have surmised, is by way of prelude to a report of Mr. Koussevitzky's local début as a double bass virtuoso, and I might as well set down now that Mr. Koussevitzky's virtuosity with the bull fiddle is as great as his virtuosity with an orchestra, and perhaps greater. His concert, in which he had the assistance of M. Henri Casadesus, who played viola d'amore, and Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, whose piano accompaniments were the best that I have heard so far this season, had the air of a great artistic revelation; but it actually was merely a demonstration of Mr. Koussevitzky's ability to make his Amati bass say "Uncle." "Uncle" is a pretty good transcription of the sound that a double bass makes when it is treated to some vigorous bowing on the lower strings.

NEWS
NOV 2 - 1928

Symphony Orchestra, With Koussevitzky, Score Success

HERE'S truth as well as poetry in "music lends enchantment." It is possible for music to be so beautiful that an entire audience feels the spell and falls under the influence. It was demonstrated at Masonic hall Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Cleveland after an absence of ten years and played a program under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Probably most of us have heard that the Boston orchestra has deteriorated since those ante-bellum days when Karl Muck held the baton. Well, we know now that any such statement is a malicious lie or an error in judgment. Under Koussevitzky, it remains the same marvelous ensemble. To me it is the best symphony orchestra on earth; and I say this, comparing it to most of the famous ones in this country and in Europe. It seems to be one wonderful instrument from which come tones such as no other orchestra seems to produce. Strings superb, but so are the woodwinds and brasses. A sublime aggregation of virtuosity. And when this huge instrument of 110 pieces sits around the platform on which stands a genius of a conductor, like Koussevitzky, the result may be imagined by all who were not present last evening. It was one of those musical events beside which one puts a mark to prompt the memory as the fog of time comes on.

I think I never have heard such an enthusiastic outburst of praise as followed the first and second part of this symphony concert. The lobby fairly echoed from the comments of approval.

And there was a large crowd to hear and to praise. I noticed a few vacant seats, but not many. The auditorium was filled with music lovers who knew that they were hearing music rendered as well as it can be by human powers.

* * *

ONE may agree or disagree with M. Koussevitzky's readings. Some of them seem to be a bit "individual." But one may not doubt that he accomplishes exactly the thing that he wants to accomplish with the instrumentalists.

For example, I though his "Afternoon of a Faune" was rather slow in tempo. I have seen it danced in Paris, heard it played by many conductors, and never so slow before. But the effect was gorgeous in color and very beautiful.

His Prokofieff "Classical" symphony was played here for the first time. A work that might be called pretty, and without any of the "modernisms" that we sometimes expect from this composer. It seemed not a notable composition, but a most comfortable piece to hear, almost like a Mozart symphony, so far as melodies go.

The orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" were wonderfully well presented. One rarely hears such a perfect melodic representation of a pagan dance—and of romantic love. Ravel rises in one's estimation, after hearing Koussevitzky reveal his work.

The second part of the program was devoted to Brahms' second symphony—one of the familiar works on its scale of modern musical literature. And with this, the conductor again was penetrating and revealing; both of himself and of Brahms. It was a masterpiece of conducting and of playing.

It is to be hoped that the Bostonians will put us back on the list of "cities visited each year" and keep us there.

* * *

THEY gave DeWolf Hopper a banquet to celebrate his fiftieth anniversary as an actor. One of the speakers toasted "the greatest husband of them all" and a telegram came from Edna Wallace Hopper saying: "Heartiest congratulations from one of your wives and one who ought to know."

* * *

CERTAINLY, there are droll happenings in New York. Now they will give a Duncan festival at the Manhattan Opera house in memory of Isadora Duncan, the dancer. Last time Isadora was in America, she was snubbed, left and right, unappreciated, almost ignored as an artist, and a politician was quoted as saying: "That woman should never be allowed to return to America." It happens that "that woman" was a great-granddaughter of a soldier of the revolutionary war!

* * *

LAST winter we heard reports of the remarkable singing of the Russian Kedroff quartet. Later the Women's City club brought the quartet to Cleveland; and the vocalists lived up to the praise that had been lavished upon them in the east. The Women's City club is bringing them back for a concert Nov. 17. . . . The Fortnightly Musical club will present Severin Eisenberger in a piano recital at Hotel Statler the evening of Nov. 7. . . . Edwin Arthur Kraft will give an organ recital at Trinity cathedral next Monday evening. . . . The Stratford Players, booked for an engagement later in the season at the Hanna theater, are scheduled to give a performance of "Julius Caesar" at Glenville auditorium this evening, under the auspices of the Drama club.

* * *

CHANGES in some of the vaudeville-film house programs take place today: Billy Dess and company share topline honors with Kelly and Jackson in "Oh May" at the Park theater. The Victoria troupe features a brass band on wheels. Others: Jean Granese, and Cowan and Gray. The film is "Beggars of Life."

Jimmy Lucas in "Vampire and Fool of 1928" is topliner at Keith's 105th theater, assisted by Geraldine Herbert. Others: the Wyoming Four, Paulo, Paquita and Chiquita, the Nevines, Gordon and company and Adelaide Nelson and her baby elephants. Film: "Win That Girl."

Five acts of vaudeville are offered, commencing today at Loew's Granada, the program topped by the Royal Welsh Gleeman and including O'Dunn and Day, Palermo's Canines, Marcus Berta and Abbot and Bisland in "A Night at a Night Club." Film: "The Patent Leather Kid."

* * *

SEVERAL inquiries have been received in regard to that excellent actor, A. E. Matthews in "Interference" at the Ohio. Yes, he has appeared here before—several times, I believe. Last time with Ina Claire in "The Last of Mrs. Cheney." He is as much at home on the London stage, as in the American theater, having appeared over there frequently in American plays and this side in English plays. He is an Englishman by birth.

PRESS
NOV 3 - 1928

Boston Symphony Opens Season, Here

Initial Event of Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's Thirteenth Year Gala Occasion. Koussevitsky and His Men Given Cordial Reception in Syria Mosque. Beethoven's "Eroica" Proves Gem of Evening—Debussy Pleases.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL.
Press Music Critic.

REGARDLESS of the number of times one has heard Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, always new beauties, hitherto unsuspected, unfold themselves to the listener. And always one can count on an orchestra like the Boston Symphony—which opened the thirteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's concerts in Syria mosque last night—to give just the right touch to the master composer's work. Especially so under the inspiring direction of such a conductor as Serge Koussevitzky.

It was something of a gala event, this initial concert of the new season. One might speak of the throng that filled the greater part of the mosque; of the brilliant audience in which wealth mingled and rubbed shoulders with the struggling student, but it was the music that occupied the place of honor, and it is of the music we will speak.

Judging by the cordial reception accorded both conductor and players, the program was enjoyed to the fullest extent. Opening with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete, Ballet"—a series of sketchy, sometimes eerie, numbers—it proceeded to Debussy. Followed Wagner's "Prelude to the Mastersingers," and then the greatest number of all, the Beethoven Symphony.

* * *

IN the Stravinsky offering, scored for stringed instruments, one encounters varied moods—sometimes dreamy, sometimes hazy—with the peculiarly baffling cadences that leave us in doubt as to whether there is more to come. There are expressive incidental soli for different members of the string family, but some rather wide gaps, three or four octaves apart, lead one to wonder just what impression the composer meant to convey. As a whole, though, the music is, after all, satisfying, with its rapidly changing gallimaufry, keeping the listener keyed up to the height of expectancy that sometimes fails to altogether materialize. Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from the Stravinsky all that was in it, with his splendid body of players.

Debussy was rather more satisfying in his nocturns, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The wood wind and stringed ensemble kept up a continual badinage, the cold quality of the lower tones in the first named section being dissipated by the genial warmth of the strings, in answer, during the "Clouds" number, which was real "tone painting." In the second there is a particularly lovely melody for solo viols. Effective combinations in harp and flute lent a charming color to this number, one of the most entrancing on the program.

* * *

WAGNER'S overture, leading off with that great C chord, is based on the principal themes in the opera from which it takes its name, and introduces about all the devices to be found in the modern orchestra, up 'till within a few years ago at least. It has been given here so often that everybody is tolerably familiar with the general character of the music which, in spots, verges upon the ironic. The more tone you get out of the orchestra the better goes the overture, it seems, and the Boston Symphony went at it, hammer and tongs, and tympani and brass, to be sure, which made for a rather glowing performance.

After that, what a relief to listen to the Beethoven, especially as played by this orchestra. The first movement, "Allegro con brio," was given with a verve that would have delighted the composer himself. Mr. Koussevitzky never forces his players, but never allows things to lag either, and the well balanced ensemble was pleasing. The "Marcia funebre" was given a reading that did not overlook any of the essentials in this quite lengthy movement.

As for the "Scherzo," it reminded one of a terrific downpour of rain on the roof, with the biting staccato of the strings, and the vivacious repartee between these and the wood winds. Outstanding features, to me, were the wonderfully effective playing of the horns in that haunting woodland refrain and the compelling answer from the strings, with changes of rhythm that foreshadowed Brahms. The finale—part of the wind

NEW YORK
NEW YORKER
NOV 3 - 1928

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
NOV 3 - 1928

...DIVISION ...ERS TO MEET

...ciation District Convention in ...ar Association to Address ...rch Adult Section.

Society formed a capacity audience last night in Syria mosque to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. Many distinguished guests were present among whom was Mrs. Robert Goheen, of Vengurla, India, daughter of Sir James Ewing who was knighted by the English government for service in India. Mrs. Goheen has been a resident of India practically all her life and is the wife of one of the leading surgeons of a missionary hospital in India. She was a guest in the box of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson. The latter wore a silver gray evening wrap topped with a huge fox collar of blending hue. Other guests in the Clemson box were Mr. and Mrs. John G. Clemson of Los Angeles. Mrs. Clemson was strikingly attractive in her wrap of ermine with fox collar. Her hair of silver added to her perfect ensemble. Mr. and Mrs. Hallock Sherard were also guests of the Clemson's and Mrs. Sherard wore a gown of heavy satin of a rose-pink shade. Mrs. Goheen wore a gold metallic wrap with sable trimmed collar and cuff effect.

Others present were Mrs. W. C. Dierks of Edgewood, who wore a black lace gown. Miss Jane McElDowney was seen wearing an apple green taffeta frock, and her sister, Mrs. Walters, wore a black net creation. Miss Elizabeth Hogue was in company with Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson of Baird st. Miss Hogue was wearing a black velvet wrap with huge white fox collar and Mrs. Wilson wore a semi-formal gown of a gold metallic and brown combination. Dr. and Mrs. C. W. Morton were also entertaining in their box. Mrs. Morton was attired in a peach colored gown with sequined bodice.

Other boxholders for last night's concert were: Mrs. Charles Bruckman, John F. Casey, Mrs. Donald G. Clark, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Dr. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. L. Girard Firth, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. William H. Hall, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. Roy A. Hunt, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mrs. J. E. Lewis.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
NOV 3 - 1928

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Syria Mosque

PROGRAM

Apollon Musagete, Ballet ..... Stravinsky
Scene I. Birth of Apollo.
Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses); Variation of Polymnia; Variation of Terpsichore; Variation of Apollo; Apollo and Terpsichore; Coda (Apollo and the Muses); Apotheosis.

Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages; (b) Fetes.

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

As customary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened [illegible] Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's concerts in Syria Mosque, and once again set standards that will be hard to approach. One may well regret the vacant places at these concerts, for nowhere else in the world is one privileged to hear such music.

Interest at first centered about a new Stravinsky work, ballet music for strings alone, and music that always will remind us of the fine quality of Boston's violins, seldom of Stravinsky. If the dancing was only passable, when the ballet was produced in Paris, it is no wonder the audience paid little attention to the orchestra. It is only momentarily interesting, lacks all richness that one hears in the Bach concertos for string orchestra, and makes us suspect that Stravinsky makes more colorful instrumentation than musical designs.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" are old acquaintances here, but never have we heard them more delicately played. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude was a fine climax for the first part of the program; for once all the voices could be heard, for the Boston soloists, the French horns and English horns, the rest of the woodwinds, are virtuosos. But Koussevitsky played them a bit too strongly last evening and lost the main line of the prelude. It was too analytical; it moved heavily.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, however, showed Koussevitsky at his very best. There were no heroics in imitation of Italian or Dutch conductors; there was merely straightforward classic reading of a magnificent score, and played by America's most representative orchestra.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

THE NEW YORKER

MUSICAL EVENTS

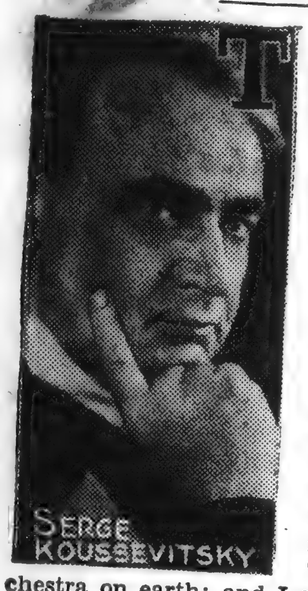
A Double Bass Says "Uncle"—Recitals Sans Casualties—This Symphonic Jazz Age

ALMOST all of the orchestra conductors were at one time solo instrumentalists, but most of them have put their virtuoso careers behind them. Mr. Mengelberg occasionally directs from a pseudo-harpsichord, and Mr. Damrosch illustrates his lectures with a bit of piano-playing, but up to last week Mr. Gabrilowitsch was the only licensed director whose solo performances were something more than excursions from his regular business. Mr. Stokowski used to be an organist, but he has not been heard here in that capacity since his early days. I never heard him perform during his term of service at a New York church, but I have learned from a gentleman who directed many funerals in the Stokowski régime that few organists of his acquaintance were so helpful.

This, as you may have surmised, is by way of prelude to a report of Mr. Koussevitzky's local début as a double bass virtuoso, and I might as well set down now that Mr. Koussevitzky's virtuosity with the bull fiddle is as great as his virtuosity with an orchestra, and perhaps greater. His concert, in which he had the assistance of M. Henri Casadesus, who played viola d'amore, and Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, whose piano accompaniments were the best that I have heard so far this season, had the air of a great artistic revelation; but it actually was merely a demonstration of Mr. Koussevitzky's ability to make his Amati bass say "Uncle." "Uncle" is a pretty good transcription of the sound that a double bass makes when it is treated to some vigorous bowing on the lower strings.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 2 - 1928

Symphony Orchestra, With Koussevitzky, Score Success



THERE'S truth as well as poetry in "music lends enchantment." It is possible for music to be so beautiful that an entire audience feels the spell and falls under the influence. It was demonstrated at Masonic hall Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra returned to Cleveland after an absence of ten years and played a program under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Probably most of us have heard that the Boston orchestra has deteriorated since those ante-bellum days when Karl Muck held the baton. Well, we know now that any such statement is a malicious lie or an error in judgment. Under Koussevitzky, it remains the same marvelous ensemble. To me it is the best symphony orchestra on earth; and I say this, comparing it to most of the famous ones in this country and in Europe. It seems to be one wonderful instrument from which come tones such as no other orchestra seems to produce. Strings superb, but so are the woodwinds and brasses. A sublime aggregation of virtuosity. And when this huge instrument of 110 pieces sits around the platform on which stands a genius of a conductor, like Koussevitzky, the result may be imagined by all who were not present last evening. It was one of those musical events beside which one puts a mark to prompt the memory as the fog of time comes on.

I think I never have heard such an enthusiastic outburst of praise as followed the first and second part of this symphony concert. The lobby fairly echoed from the comments of approval.

And there was a large crowd to hear and to praise. I noticed a few vacant seats, but not many. The auditorium was filled with music lovers who knew that they were hearing music rendered as well as it can be by human powers.

* * *

ONE may agree or disagree with M. Koussevitzky's readings. Some of them seem to be a bit "individual." But one may not doubt that he accomplishes exactly the thing that he wants to accomplish with the instrumentalists.

For example, I though his "Afternoon of a Faune" was rather slow in tempo. I have seen it danced in Paris, heard it played by many conductors; and never so slow before. But the effect was gorgeous in color and very beautiful.

His Prokofieff "Classical" symphony was played here for the first time. A work that might be called pretty, and without any of the "modernisms" that we sometimes expect from this composer. It seemed not a notable composition; but a most comfortable piece to hear, almost like a Mozart symphony, so far as melodies go.

The orchestral excerpts from Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" were wonderfully well presented. One rarely hears such a perfect melodic representation of a pagan dance—and of romantic love. Ravel rises in one's estimation, after hearing Koussevitzky reveal his work.

The second part of the program was devoted to Brahms' second symphony—one of the familiar works on its scale of modern musical literature. And with this, the conductor again was penetrating and revealing; both of himself and of Brahms. It was a masterpiece of conducting and of playing.

It is to be hoped that the Bostonians will put us back on the list of "cities visited each year" and keep us there.

* * *

THEY gave DeWolf Hopper a banquet to celebrate his fiftieth anniversary as an actor. One of the speakers toasted "the greatest husband of them all" and a telegram came from Edna Wallace Hopper saying: "Heartiest congratulations from one of your wives and one who ought to know."

* * *

CERTAINLY, there are droll happenings in New York. Now they will give a Duncan festival at the Manhattan Opera house in memory of Isadora Duncan, the dancer. Last time Isadora was in America, she was snubbed, left and right, unappreciated, almost ignored as an artist, and a politician was quoted as saying: "That woman should never be allowed to return to America." It happens that "that woman" was a great-granddaughter of a soldier of the revolutionary war!

* * *

LAST winter we heard reports of the remarkable singing of the Russian Kedroff quartet. Later the Women's City club brought the quartet to Cleveland; and the vocalists lived up to the praise that had been lavished upon them in the east. The Women's City club is bringing them back for a concert Nov. 17. . . . The Fortnightly Musical club will present Severin Eisenberger in a piano recital at Hotel Statler the evening of Nov. 7. . . . Edwin Arthur Kraft will give an organ recital at Trinity cathedral next Monday evening. . . . The Stratford Players, booked for an engagement later in the season at the Hanna theater, are scheduled to give a performance of "Julius Caesar" at Glenville auditorium this evening, under the auspices of the Drama club.

* * *

CHANGES in some of the vaudeville-film house programs take place today: Billy Dess and company share topline honors with Kelly and Jackson in "Oh May" at the Park theater. The Victoria troupe features a brass band on wheels. Others: Jean Granese, and Cowan and Gray. The film is "Beggars of Life."

Jimmy Lucas in "Vampire and Fool of 1928" is topliner at Keith's 105th theater, assisted by Geraldine Herbert. Others: the Wyoming Four, Paulo, Paquita and Chiquita, the Nevines, Gordon and company and Adelaide Nelson and her baby elephants. Film: "Win That Girl."

Five acts of vaudeville are offered, commencing today at Loew's Granada, the program topped by the Royal Welsh Gleeman and including O'Dunn and Day, Palermo's Canines, Marcus Berta and Abbot and Bisland in "A Night at a Night Club." Film: "The Patent Leather Kid."

* * *

SEVERAL inquiries have been received in regard to that excellent actor, A. E. Matthews in "Interference" at the Ohio. Yes, he has appeared here before—several times, I believe. Last time with Ina Claire in "The Last of Mrs. Cheney." He is as much at home on the London stage as in the American theater, having appeared over there frequently in American plays and this side in English plays. He is an Englishman by birth.

PITTSBURG
PRESS
NOV - 1928

210

Boston Symphony Opens Season, Here

Initial Event of Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's Thirteenth Year Gala Occasion. Koussevitsky and His Men Given Cordial Reception in Syria Mosque. Beethoven's "Eroica" Proves Gem of Evening—Debussy Pleases.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL.
Press Music Critic.

REGARDLESS of the number of times one has heard Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony, always new beauties, hitherto unsuspected, unfold themselves to the listener. And always one can count on an orchestra like the Boston Symphony—which opened the thirteenth season of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association's concerts in Syria mosque last night—to give just the right touch to the master composer's work. Especially so under the inspiring direction of such a conductor as Serge Koussevitzky.

It was something of a gala event, this initial concert of the new season. One might speak of the throng that filled the greater part of the mosque; of the brilliant audience in which wealth mingled and rubbed shoulders with the struggling student, but it was the music that occupied the place of honor, and it is of the music we will speak.

Judging by the cordial reception accorded both conductor and players, the program was enjoyed to the fullest extent. Opening with Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete, Ballet"—a series of sketchy, sometimes eerie, numbers—it proceeded to Debussy. Followed Wagner's "Prelude to the Mastersingers," and then the greatest number of all, the Beethoven Symphony.

* * *

IN the Stravinsky offering, scored for stringed instruments, one encounters varied moods—sometimes dreamy, sometimes hazy—with the peculiarly baffling cadences that leave us in doubt as to whether there is more to come. There are expressive incidental soli for different members of the string family, but some rather wide gaps, three or four octaves apart, lead one to wonder just what impression the composer meant to convey. As a whole, though, the music is, after all, satisfying, with its rapidly changing gallimaufry, keeping the listener keyed up to the height of expectancy that sometimes fails to altogether materialize. Mr. Koussevitzky extracted from the Stravinsky all that was in it, with his splendid body of players.

Debussy was rather more satisfying in his nocturns, "Clouds" and "Festivals." The wood wind and stringed ensemble kept up a continual badinage, the cold quality of the lower tones in the first named section being dissipated by the genial warmth of the strings, in answer, during the "Clouds" number, which was real "tone painting." In the second there is a particularly lovely melody for solo viola. Effective combinations in harp and flute lent a charming color to this number, one of the most entrancing on the program.

* * *

WAGNER'S overture, leading off with that great C chord, is based on the principal themes in the opera from which it takes its name, and introduces about all the devices to be found in the modern orchestra, up 'till within a few years ago at least. It has been given here so often that everybody is tolerably familiar with the general character of the music which, in spots, verges upon the ironic. The more tone you get out of the orchestra the better goes the overture, it seems, and the Boston Symphony went at it, hammer and tongs, and tympani and brass, to be sure, which made for a rather glowing performance.

After that, what a relief to listen to the Beethoven, especially as played by this orchestra. The first movement, "Allegro con brio," was given with a verve that would have delighted the composer himself. Mr. Koussevitzky never forces his players, but never allows things to lag either, and the well balanced ensemble was pleasing. The "Marcia funebre" was given a reading that did not overlook any of the essentials in this quite lengthy movement.

As for the "Scherzo," it reminded one of a terrific downpour of rain on the roof, with the biting staccato of the strings, and the vivacious repartee between these and the wood winds. Outstanding features, to me, were the wonderfully effective playing of the horns in that haunting woodland refrain and the compelling answer from the strings, with changes of rhythm that foreshadowed Brahms. The finale—part of it in the free fugue style, the wind instruments pitted against the strings—with its rousing climax, was given with the assurance that only such an orchestra as the Boston can command.

PITTSBURG, PA.
PRESS
NOV

RS TO MEET

ciation District Convention ir ar Association to Address rch Adult Section.

SMART society formed a capacity audience last night in Syria mosque to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra. Many distinguished guests were present among whom was Mrs. Robert Goheen, of Vengurla, India, daughter of Sir James Ewing who was knighted by the English government for service in India. Mrs. Goheen has been a resident of India practically all her life and is the wife of one of the leading surgeons of a missionary hospital in India. She was a guest in the box of Mr. and Mrs. Daniel M. Clemson. The latter wore a silver gray evening wrap topped with a huge fox collar of blending hue. Other guests in the Clemson box were Mr. and Mrs. John G. Clemson of Los Angeles. Mrs. Clemson was strikingly attractive in her wrap of ermine with fox collar. Her hair of silver added to her perfect ensemble. Mr. and Mrs. Hallock Sherard were also guests of the Clemson's and Mrs. Sherard wore a gown of heavy satin of a rose-pink shade. Mrs. Goheen wore a gold metallic wrap with sable trimmed collar and cuff effect.

Others present were Mrs. W. C. Dierks of Edgewood, who wore a black lace gown. Miss Jane McEldowney was seen wearing an apple green taffeta frock, and her sister, Mrs. Walters, wore a black net creation. Miss Elizabeth Hogue was in company with Mrs. Robert Lee Wilson of Baird st. Miss Hogue was wearing a black velvet wrap with huge white fox collar and Mrs. Wilson wore a semi-formal gown of a gold metallic and brown combination. Dr. and Mrs. C. W. Morton were also entertaining in their box. Mrs. Morton was attired in a peach colored gown with sequined bodice.

Other boxholders for last night's concert were: Mrs. Charles Bruckman, John F. Casey, Mrs. Donald G. Clark, Mrs. S. G. Cooper, Dr. Ogden M. Edwards, Mrs. L. Girard Firth, Mrs. Ralph Flinn, T. J. Gillespie, Mrs. William H. Hall, Mrs. George Harwood, Mrs. H. K. Hitchcock, Mrs. W. J. Holland, Mrs. A. L. Humphrey, Mrs. Roy A. Hunt, Mrs. Alfred E. Hunt, Mrs. John Lawrence, Mrs. J. E. Lewis.

PITTSBURG, PA.
SUN TELEGRAPH
NOV

MUSIC

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Syria Mosque

PROGRAM

Apollon Musagete, Ballet ..... Stravinsky
Scene I. Birth of Apollo.
Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses); Variation of Polymnia; Variation of Terpsichore; Variation of Apollo; Apollo and Terpsichore; Coda (Apollo and the Muses); Apotheosis.

Nocturnes ..... Debussy
(a) Nuages; (b) Fetes.

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" ..... Wagner

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55 ..... Beethoven
I. Allegro con brio. II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai. III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

As customary, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened our Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's concerts in Syria Mosque, and once again set standards that will be hard to approach. One may well regret the vacant places at these concerts, for nowhere else in the world is one privileged to hear such music.

Interest at first centered about a new Stravinsky work, ballet music for strings alone, and music that always will remind us of the fine quality of Boston's violins, seldom of Stravinsky. If the dancing was only passable, when the ballet was produced in Paris, it is no wonder the audience paid little attention to the orchestra. It is only momentarily interesting, lacks all richness that one hears in the Bach concertos for string orchestra, and makes us suspect that Stravinsky makes more colorful instrumentation than musical designs.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" are old acquaintances here, but never have we heard them more delicately played. Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude was a fine climax for the first part of the program; for once all the voices could be heard, for the Boston soloists, the French horns and English horns, the rest of the woodwinds, are virtuosos. But Koussevitsky played them a bit too strongly last evening and lost the main line of the prelude. It was too analytical; it moved heavily.

Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, however, showed Koussevitsky at his very best. There were no heroics in imitation of Italian or Dutch conductors; there was merely straightforward classic reading of a magnificent score, and played by America's most representative orchestra.

J. FRED LISSFELT.

MUSICAL EVENTS

A Double Bass Says "Uncle"—Recitals Sans Casualties—This Symphonic Jazz Age

ALMOST all of the orchestra conductors were at one time solo instrumentalists, but most of them have put their virtuoso careers behind them. Mr. Mengelberg occasionally directs from a pseudo-harpsichord, and Mr. Damrosch illustrates his lectures with a bit of piano-playing, but up to last week Mr. Gabrilowitsch was the only licensed director whose solo performances were something more than excursions from his regular business. Mr. Stokowski used to be an organist, but he has not been heard here in that capacity since his early days. I never heard him perform during his term of service at a New York church, but I have learned from a gentleman who directed many funerals in the Stokowski régime that few organists of his acquaintance were so helpful.

This, as you may have surmised, is by way of prelude to a report of Mr. Koussevitzky's local début as a double bass virtuoso, and I might as well set down now that Mr. Koussevitzky's virtuosity with the bull fiddle is as great as his virtuosity with an orchestra, and perhaps greater. His concert, in which he had the assistance of M. Henri Casadesus, who played viola d'amore, and Mr. Pierre Luboshutz, whose piano accompaniments were the best that I have heard so far this season, had the air of a great artistic revelation; but it actually was merely a demonstration of Mr. Koussevitzky's ability to make his Amati bass say "Uncle." "Uncle" is a pretty good transcription of the sound that a double bass makes when it is treated to some vigorous bowing on the lower strings.

211 CON. FROM P. 210

THE music of the evening was of no importance. The Big Event was Mr. Koussevitzky's home-made concerto for double bass, a twenty-six-year-old work which did not betray its composer's predilection for modernism, and which might easily have been mistaken for a collaboration between Tschaikowsky and Paganini. Somebody might rearrange it for violin and have a highly serviceable concerto to add to the small group of show bits that fiddlers enjoy playing. There are two themes in it that must have been stimulating to any popular songwriters in the audience, and it gave Mr. Koussevitzky every possible opportunity to demonstrate his agility and his skill in making a double bass sound almost as canorous as a slightly hoarse 'cello. The duos with M. Casadesus proved again Mr. Koussevitzky's musicianship and taste, but the whole evening was more interesting as a show than as a musical adventure.

There was one fine piece of theatricalism which deserves special attention. The double bass was brought on by a young man who obviously was in awe of the instrument and who handled it delicately with white gloves at least eight sizes too large for him.

EXCEPT for Mr. Koussevitzky's legerdemain, there has not been much excitement in the early recital season. Mme. Hempel returned in fine voice and with a program hardly worthy of an artist who has to her credit so many fine achievements. Mme. Hempel is much more interesting as Mme. Hempel than as a postponed Jenny Lind. John Charles Thomas, who has been singing in opera almost everywhere except in New York, gave a concert which indicated that he is growing constantly, not only in vocal skill but in program-making as well. The Beethoven Association began its season by celebrating the Schubert death centennial with a characteristic mélange of well-rehearsed and almost impromptu chamber music and songs.

• •

Mr. Damrosch's first session with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which is more Philharmonic than Symphony, was marked by a genuinely jazzy performance of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" music. The jazz of the score is rather academic, but Mr. Damrosch went Ben Bernie with it and made more of it than any of his predecessors. The only other noteworthy event of the pre-opera week was a demure bit of drollery by a somewhat weighty lady who sang "Would God I Were The Tender Apple Blossom." —R. A. S.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NOV 3 - 1928

MUSIC

Boston Symphony-Mosque.

By HARVEY GAUL.

A large, representatve and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

MUSIC

...audience which arrived in a state of puzzled anticipation, and left in one of something more than satisfaction.

Long before M. Koussevitzy visited these shores he was known in Europe as a virtuoso on the bass viol—the last item in the orchestral ensemble to suggest its use for solo purposes!

And now America knows him for such, too. The leading critics manifest interesting unanimity on the various points of his recital. They agree wholeheartedly that he manipulates the instrument with extraordinary skill, and contrives to elevate its appeal into the 'cello class; they unite in expressing real enjoyment of the tonal qualities he elicits and the phrases he makes. And they combine in a realization that there is very little interesting music available for use in this way.

Altogether, this occasion seems to have cemented all the more firmly the exceedingly cordial relations between New York's music-lovers and this maestro of Boston's symphonic forces.

• • •

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

A Solo Bull Fiddle.

Let no person inveigle you into attending a recital on the double-bass (also known as the contra-bass, likewise the "bull-fiddle"). I went to one the other night. The performer was our old friend Serge Koussevitzky who, before his ascendency to the conductor's rostrum of the Boston Symphony, was regarded in Europe as the virtuoso of all who play this unwieldy instrument.

There is very little to say regarding this recital, beyond its being novel and extremely dull. Mr. Koussevitzky unquestionably is an exceptional double bassist, but who wants to hear an instrument which ...a ? ...e ...y

TIME

NOV 1928

MUSIC

In Unison

Three years ago Musical America offered a $3,000 prize for the best symphonic work submitted by a U. S. composer. Last spring Judges Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Alfred Hertz and Frederick Stock voted the prize to Ernest Bloch for a symphony named America. In late December, almost simultaneously, the five conductor-judges will give America its first performances—Dec. 20 in Manhattan and San Francisco, Dec. 21 in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago. Other major orchestras may lift their voices in unison.

Koussevitzky's Double-bass

A young Russian, no money in his pocket, trudged up the steps of the Moscow Conservatory and asked for a scholarship. Scholarships were scarce, they told him. There was just one left—and that for the double-bass. The boy hesitated, turned as if to go and then came back, asked if they would teach him the double-bass.

Twenty years ago there was no greater contrabassist in all Europe than Serge Koussevitzky but he outgrew even that colossal instrument, became a conductor. Not until last year did he gather his admiring Bostonians around him and show them what he used to do with the double-bass. Boston rhapsodized but Manhattan waited to form her own judgment. In Boston King Koussevitzky can do no wrong.

Neither could he last week in Manhattan. Of his first double-bass recital there, Critic Lawrence Gilman wrote in part:

"He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude, or speak oracular solemnities, but who can sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of sombre richness that no cello is able to attain.

"From Mr. Koussevitzky's lowest string issues a tone purged of all raucousness, noble and superb, and from thence upward the scale is pure, euphonious, beguiling—upward to the region of the flageolet tones, where Mr. Koussevitzky's harmonies have a clear, ethereal and crystalline loveliness that challenges credulity."

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

NOV 3 - 1928

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts, if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.

NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.

NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once", even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

211 CON. FROM P. 210

THE music of the evening was of no importance. The Big Event was Mr. Koussevitzky's home-made concerto for double bass, a twenty-six-year-old work which did not betray its composer's predilection for modernism, and which might easily have been mistaken for a collaboration between Tschaikowsky and Paganini. Somebody might rearrange it for violin and have a highly serviceable concerto to add to the small group of show bits that fiddlers enjoy playing. There are two themes in it that must have been stimulating to any popular songwriters in the audience, and it gave Mr. Koussevitzky every possible opportunity to demonstrate his agility and his skill in making a double bass sound almost as canorous as a slightly hoarse 'cello. The duos with M. Casadesus proved again Mr. Koussevitzky's musicianship and taste, but the whole evening was more interesting as a show than as a musical adventure.

There was one fine piece of theatricalism which deserves special attention. The double bass was brought on by a young man who obviously was in awe of the instrument and who handled it delicately with white gloves at least eight sizes too large for him.

EXCEPT for Mr. Koussevitzky's legerdemain, there has not been much excitement in the early recital season. Mme. Hempel returned in fine voice and with a program hardly worthy of an artist who has to her credit so many fine achievements. Mme. Hempel is much more interesting as Mme. Hempel than as a postponed Jenny Lind. John Charles Thomas, who has been singing in opera almost everywhere except in New York, gave a concert which indicated that he is growing constantly, not only in vocal skill but in program-making as well. The Beethoven Association began its season by celebrating the Schubert death centennial with a characteristic mélange of well-rehearsed and almost impromptu chamber music and songs.

• •

Mr. Damrosch's first session with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which is more Philharmonic than Symphony, was marked by a genuinely jazzy performance of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" music. The jazz of the score is rather academic, but Mr. Damrosch went Ben Bernie with it and made more of it than any of his predecessors. The only other noteworthy event of the pre-opera week was a demure bit of drollery by a somewhat weighty lady who sang "Would God I Were The Tender Apple Blossom." —R. A. S.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NOV 3 1928

MUSIC

Boston Symphony-Mosque.

By HARVEY GAUL.

A large, representatve and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

...audience which arrived in a state of puzzled anticipation, and left in one of something more than satisfaction.

Long before M. Koussevitzy visited these shores he was known in Europe as a virtuoso on the bass viol—the last item in the orchestral ensemble to suggest its use for solo purposes!

And now America knows him for such, too. The leading critics manifest interesting unanimity on the various points of his recital. They agree wholeheartedly that he manipulates the instrument with extraordinary skill, and contrives to elevate its appeal into the 'cello class; they unite in expressing real enjoyment of the tonal qualities he elicits and the phrases he makes. And they combine in a realization that there is very little interesting music available for use in this way.

Altogether, this occasion seems to have cemented all the more firmly the exceedingly cordial relations between New York's music-lovers and this maestro of Boston's symphonic forces.

• • •

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

A Solo Bull Fiddle.

Let no person inveigle you into attending a recital on the double-bass (also known as the contra-bass, likewise the "bull-fiddle"). I went to one the other night. The performer was our old friend Serge Koussevitzky who, before his ascendency to the conductor's rostrum of the Boston Symphony, was regarded in Europe as the virtuoso of all who play this unwieldy instrument.

There is very little to say regarding this recital, beyond its being novel and extremely dull. Mr. Koussevitzky unquestionably is an exceptional double bassist, but who wants to hear an instrument which belongs exclusively in the orchestra brought forth in a solo capacity? There also is little literature for the double bass. And so—why, one may rightly inquire, a recital for it?

Distinguished Singing

Three years ago Musical America offered a $3,000 prize for the best symphonic work submitted by a U. S. composer. Last spring Judges Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Alfred Hertz and Frederick Stock voted the prize to Ernest Bloch for a symphony named America. In late December, almost simultaneously, the five conductor-judges will give America its first performances—Dec. 20 in Manhattan and San Francisco, Dec. 21 in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago. Other major orchestras may lift their voices in unison.

Koussevitzky's Double-bass

A young Russian, no money in his pocket, trudged up the steps of the Moscow Conservatory and asked for a scholarship. Scholarships were scarce, they told him. There was just one left—and that for the double-bass. The boy hesitated, turned as if to go and then came back, asked if they would teach him the double-bass.

Twenty years ago there was no greater contrabassist in all Europe than Serge Koussevitzky but he outgrew even that colossal instrument, became a conductor. Not until last year did he gather his admiring Bostonians around him and show them what he used to do with the double-bass. Boston rhapsodized but Manhattan waited to form her own judgment. In Boston King Koussevitzky can do no wrong.

Neither could he last week in Manhattan. Of his first double-bass recital there, Critic Lawrence Gilman wrote in part:

"He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude, or speak oracular solemnities, but who can sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of sombre richness that no cello is able to attain.

"From Mr. Koussevitzky's lowest string issues a tone purged of all raucousness, noble and superb, and from thence upward the scale is pure, euphonious, beguiling—upward to the region of the flageolet tones, where Mr. Koussevitzky's harmonies have a clear, ethereal and crystalline loveliness that challenges credulity."

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN

NOV 3 1928

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts, if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.

NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.

NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once", even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

1311 CON. FROM P. 210

THE music of the evening was of no importance. The Big Event was Mr. Koussevitzky's home-made concerto for double bass, a twenty-six-year-old work which did not betray its composer's predilection for modernism, and which might easily have been mistaken for a collaboration between Tschaikowsky and Paganini. Somebody might rearrange it for violin and have a highly serviceable concerto to add to the small group of show bits that fiddlers enjoy playing. There are two themes in it that must have been stimulating to any popular songwriters in the audience, and it gave Mr. Koussevitzky every possible opportunity to demonstrate his agility and his skill in making a double bass sound almost as canorous as a slightly hoarse 'cello. The duos with M. Casadesus proved again Mr. Koussevitzky's musicianship and taste, but the whole evening was more interesting as a show than as a musical adventure.

There was one fine piece of theatricalism which deserves special attention. The double bass was brought on by a young man who obviously was in awe of the instrument and who handled it delicately with white gloves at least eight sizes too large for him.

EXCEPT for Mr. Koussevitzky's legerdemain, there has not been much excitement in the early recital season. Mme. Hempel returned in fine voice and with a program hardly worthy of an artist who has to her credit so many fine achievements. Mme. Hempel is much more interesting as Mme. Hempel than as a postponed Jenny Lind. John Charles Thomas, who has been singing in opera almost everywhere except in New York, gave a concert which indicated that he is growing constantly, not only in vocal skill but in program-making as well. The Beethoven Association began its season by celebrating the Schubert death centennial with a characteristic mélange of well-rehearsed and almost impromptu chamber music and songs.

• •

Mr. Damrosch's first session with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which is more Philharmonic than Symphony, was marked by a genuinely jazzy performance of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" music. The jazz of the score is rather academic, but Mr. Damrosch went Ben Bernie with it and made more of it than any of his predecessors. The only other noteworthy event of the pre-opera week was a demure bit of drollery by a somewhat weighty lady who sang "Would God I Were The Tender Apple Blossom." —R. A. S.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 3 - 1928

MUSIC

Boston Symphony-Mosque.

By HARVEY GAUL.

A large, representative and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
NOV 4 - 1928

...audience which arrived in a state of puzzled anticipation, and left in one of something more than satisfaction.

Long before M. Koussevitzy visited these shores he was known in Europe as a virtuoso on the bass viol—the last item in the orchestral ensemble to suggest its use for solo purposes!

And now America knows him for such, too. The leading critics manifest interesting unanimity on the various points of his recital. They agree wholeheartedly that he manipulates the instrument with extraordinary skill, and contrives to elevate its appeal into the 'cello class; they unite in expressing real enjoyment of the tonal qualities he elicits and the phrases he makes. And they combine in a realization that there is very little interesting music available for use in this way.

Altogether, this occasion seems to have cemented all the more firmly the exceedingly cordial relations between New York's music-lovers and this maestro of Boston's symphonic forces.

• • •

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press
NOV 4 - 1928

A Solo Bull Fiddle.

Let no person inveigle you into attending a recital on the double-bass (also known as the contra-bass, likewise the "bull-fiddle"). I went to one the other night. The performer was our old friend Serge Koussevitzky who, before his ascendency to the conductor's rostrum of the Boston Symphony, was regarded in Europe as the virtuoso of all who play this unwieldy instrument.

There is very little to say regarding this recital, beyond its being novel and extremely dull. Mr. Koussevitzky unquestionably is an exceptional double bassist, but who wants to hear an instrument which belongs exclusively in the orchestra brought forth in a solo capacity? There also is little literature for the double bass. And so—why, one may rightly inquire, a recital for it?

Distinguished Singing

Three years ago Musical America offered a $3,000 prize for the best symphonic work submitted by a U. S. composer. Last spring Judges Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Alfred Hertz and Frederick Stock voted the prize to Ernest Bloch for a symphony named America. In late December, almost simultaneously, the five conductor-judges will give America its first performances—Dec. 20 in Manhattan and San Francisco, Dec. 21 in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago. Other major orchestras may lift their voices in unison.

Koussevitzky's Double-bass

A young Russian, no money in his pocket, trudged up the steps of the Moscow Conservatory and asked for a scholarship. Scholarships were scarce, they told him. There was just one left—and that for the double-bass. The boy hesitated, turned as if to go and then came back, asked if they would teach him the double-bass.

Twenty years ago there was no greater contrabassist in all Europe than Serge Koussevitzky but he outgrew even that colossal instrument, became a conductor. Not until last year did he gather his admiring Bostonians around him and show them what he used to do with the double-bass. Boston rhapsodized but Manhattan waited to form her own judgment. In Boston King Koussevitzky can do no wrong.

Neither could he last week in Manhattan. Of his first double-bass recital there, Critic Lawrence Gilman wrote in part:

"He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude, or speak oracular solemnities, but who can sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of sombre richness that no cello is able to attain.

"From Mr. Koussevitzky's lowest string issues a tone purged of all raucousness, noble and superb, and from thence upward the scale is pure, euphonious, beguiling—upward to the region of the flageolet tones, where Mr. Koussevitzky's harmonies have a clear, ethereal and crystalline loveliness that challenges credulity."

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
NOV 6 - 1928

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once", even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

211 CON. FROM P. 210

THE music of the evening was of no importance. The Big Event was Mr. Koussevitzky's home-made concerto for double bass, a twenty-six-year-old work which did not betray its composer's predilection for modernism, and which might easily have been mistaken for a collaboration between Tschaikowsky and Paganini. Somebody might rearrange it for violin and have a highly serviceable concerto to add to the small group of show bits that fiddlers enjoy playing. There are two themes in it that must have been stimulating to any popular songwriters in the audience, and it gave Mr. Koussevitzky every possible opportunity to demonstrate his agility and his skill in making a double bass sound almost as canorous as a slightly hoarse 'cello. The duos with M. Casadesus proved again Mr. Koussevitzky's musicianship and taste, but the whole evening was more interesting as a show than as a musical adventure.

There was one fine piece of theatricalism which deserves special attention. The double bass was brought on by a young man who obviously was in awe of the instrument and who handled it delicately with white gloves at least eight sizes too large for him.

EXCEPT for Mr. Koussevitzky's legerdemain, there has not been much excitement in the early recital season. Mme. Hempel returned in fine voice and with a program hardly worthy of an artist who has to her credit so many fine achievements. Mme. Hempel is much more interesting as Mme. Hempel than as a postponed Jenny Lind. John Charles Thomas, who has been singing in opera almost everywhere except in New York, gave a concert which indicated that he is growing constantly, not only in vocal skill but in program-making as well. The Beethoven Association began its season by celebrating the Schubert death centennial with a characteristic mélange of well-rehearsed and almost impromptu chamber music and songs.

• •

Mr. Damrosch's first session with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which is more Philharmonic than Symphony, was marked by a genuinely jazzy performance of John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" music. The jazz of the score is rather academic, but Mr. Damrosch went Ben Bernie with it and made more of it than any of his predecessors. The only other noteworthy event of the pre-opera week was a demure bit of drollery by a somewhat weighty lady who sang "Would God I Were The Tender Apple Blossom." —R. A. S.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
NOV 3 - 1928

By HARVEY GAUL.

A large, representatve and appreciative audience greeted Serge Koussevitzky and the admirable Boston Symphony last night at the Mosque, when they appeared to open our Pittsburgh season of visiting orchestras.

Appreciative did we say? After the Debussy composition there was a demonstration that amounted to an ovation. Indeed so vast was the applause that one is tempted to think that Schenley Farms is becoming modernized and really prefers post impressionism to so-called classicism.

The orchestra played better than it ever did before, there was a gorgeous sonority to the strings, and as for the French horns, we thought them superlative. The ensemble, whether it was pianissimo or a rushing forte, had glow and warmth, and speaking of fortissimo, one wonders whether there is any conductor coming here who has a larger range, a greater spread of crescendo than Mr. Koussevitzky?

In many respects it was a marvelous program and while one might have wished for a transposition of numbers, a Beethoven earlier in the evening and a joyous postlude, nevertheless it was an invigorating list. To many in the audience Stravinsky was a distinct disappointment.

It was Igor Fedorvitch forgetting the vow of chromatic celibacy and harking back to Cesar Cui and Borodin. Here was no Bad Boy from Moscow but a rather formal, stilted ballet composer. Whatever may be said for his "Apollon Musagete," at least it was a sec performance. It served as an ample opportunity for a fiddle solo, a set of unexciting episodes and much listless slow-tempoed writing.

If a first performance of this Stravinsky work was unimpressive a tenth-time hearing of the Debussy "Nocturnes" was a revelation. We have always known that Mr. Koussevitzky enjoyed Debussy, but last night he caught new timbres, he gave us new effects and some of us think it was the finest piece of Debussyian interpretation we have heard. There was a ravishing tinting of "Nuages" and a finely regulated pulsation in "Fetes." Shimmering strings, dissolving cadences and that was the first, jagged accents, stunningly suppressed and developed rhythms and that was the second. No wonder the house applauded it to a bravo.

Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude concluded the first half, and that, we think, was an architectonic mistake. It should have served as it often does and that is as an overture. It was brilliantly played, with the indomitable march theme grandly blared, with the lyric moments finely sung, and in all ways was it a commensurate reading, but one wishes it had opened the concert.

A great deal has been said of Beethoven's "Eroica," both by biographers and program annotators, and while we yield to no one in admiration of this colossal genius, nevertheless we wish some monumental editor, says Hans von Bulow, could have re-edited the work. We agree with Czerny, who remembered that some uncouth wight in the gallery yelled, "I'd give another kreuzer if they would stop." Always the tiresome rondo pattern, the boresome sonata form, the countless reiterations, the fatiguing coda. There are marvelous moments in the second movement, the sotto voce strings, the low-voiced fugatto opening to an impressive end, and perhaps it is this movement that gives color to the whole work. Personally we prefer the scherzo with its folk-theme motive and witty dialogue. No one could write a better scherzetto than Beethoven, and by the same token no one could sing a better cantilena, but having heard them both one wishes the work would end.

If last night's program was notable the one to be presented this afternoon at the Mosque is twice as appealing. First there is Serge Prokofieff, followed by Debussy's "L'Apres Midi d'un Faune" (which we heard last Sunday) and then comes Maurice Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite, and the whole finishing with Brahms D major symphony. That is a program, and it is one that deserves the largest kind of audience.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

When Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, bowed [illegible] last week in the capacity of double-bass soloist, he found an audience which arrived in a state of puzzled anticipation, and left in one of something more than satisfaction.

Long before M. Koussevitzy visited these shores he was known in Europe as a virtuoso on the bass viol—the last item in the orchestral ensemble to suggest its use for solo purposes!

And now America knows him for such, too. The leading critics manifest interesting unanimity on the various points of his recital. They agree wholeheartedly that he manipulates the instrument with extraordinary skill, and contrives to elevate its appeal into the 'cello class; they unite in expressing real enjoyment of the tonal qualities he elicits and the phrases he makes. And they combine in a realization that there is very little interesting music available for use in this way.

Altogether, this occasion seems to have cemented all the more firmly the exceedingly cordial relations between New York's music-lovers and this maestro of Boston's symphonic forces.

• • •

ALBANY, N. Y.
Knickerbocker Press

A Solo Bull Fiddle.

Let no person inveigle you into attending a recital on the double-bass (also known as the contra-bass, likewise the "bull-fiddle"). I went to one the other night. The performer was our old friend Serge Koussevitzky who, before his ascendency to the conductor's rostrum of the Boston Symphony, was regarded in Europe as the virtuoso of all who play this unwieldy instrument.

There is very little to say regarding this recital, beyond its being novel and extremely dull. Mr. Koussevitzky unquestionably is an exceptional double bassist, but who wants to hear an instrument which belongs exclusively in the orchestra brought forth in a solo capacity? There also is little literature for the double bass. And so—why, one may rightly inquire, a recital for it?

Distinguished Singing

Three years ago Musical America offered a $3,000 prize for the best symphonic work submitted by a U. S. composer. Last spring Judges Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski, Alfred Hertz and Frederick Stock voted the prize to Ernest Bloch for a symphony named America. In late December, almost simultaneously, the five conductor-judges will give America its first performances—Dec. 20 in Manhattan and San Francisco, Dec. 21 in Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago. Other major orchestras may lift their voices in unison.

Koussevitzky's Double-bass

A young Russian, no money in his pocket, trudged up the steps of the Moscow Conservatory and asked for a scholarship. Scholarships were scarce, they told him. There was just one left—and that for the double-bass. The boy hesitated, turned as if to go and then came back, asked if they would teach him the double-bass.

Twenty years ago there was no greater contrabassist in all Europe than Serge Koussevitzky but he outgrew even that colossal instrument, became a conductor. Not until last year did he gather his admiring Bostonians around him and show them what he used to do with the double-bass. Boston rhapsodized but Manhattan waited to form her own judgment. In Boston King Koussevitzky can do no wrong.

Neither could he last week in Manhattan. Of his first double-bass recital there, Critic Lawrence Gilman wrote in part:

"He has noosed the cumbrous pachyderm of the violin species, has dragged him up out of the orchestral cellar and has revealed him to us as a creature who does not merely gambol with grotesque ponderosity, or grumble in discontented servitude, or speak oracular solemnities, but who can sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of sombre richness that no cello is able to attain.

"From Mr. Koussevitzky's lowest string issues a tone purged of all raucousness, noble and superb, and from thence upward the scale is pure, euphonious, beguiling—upward to the region of the flageolet tones, where Mr. Koussevitzky's harmonies have a clear, ethereal and crystalline loveliness that challenges credulity."

WESTERLY, R. I.
SUN
NOV 6 - 1928

Smiling Music

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts, if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SENTINEL
KEENE, N. H.
NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

NEWS
GARDNER, MASS.
NOV 6 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once", even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KENNE, N. H.
SENTINEL

NOV 6 -

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 7 -

...ston's pupils.

Boston Programs.

Back from a week's tour the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its home series of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The programs, unless Mr. Koussevitzky changes his intentions, will include the Five Indian Dances, Jacobi; the Symphony No. 3 in D major by Sibelius to be played for the first time in Boston; The Poem of Ecstasy, Scriabine.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SUN
BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
NOV 9 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"AND at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment most convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

NOV 9 1928

Miss [illegible] ...range the program for the meeting next Thursday.

Big Orchestra Goes Through.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, traveling in three large buses, passed through the city late yesterday afternoon, going west.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Music News, Views and Comment

Yost String Quartet to Inaugurate Series—Pittsburgh Symphony Calls Rehearsals; New York Philharmonic—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet; Here's Opportunity for Composers.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

ONE may listen with pleasure, through an hour and a half, or so, to a string quartet ensemble, and derive considerable enjoyment therefrom. But when it comes to a stringed orchestra, meaning the usual string quintet, multiplied to eight basses, about four times that number of violins, eight violoncelli and a dozen violas, the time of enjoyment—that is, of real enjoyment—would be pared down very considerably. That's just what happened when the Boston Symphony orchestra, a week ago Friday, played Stravinsky's "Appollon Musagete" ballet, in two scenes and some eight different moods. After a half hour of music from such a combination, although no one could find fault with the playing, nor with the effects that were gotten by this very fine stringed section of the orchestra, it was rather tiresome long before the close of the offering, which seemed interminably lengthy, without the relief colorings provided by wind and percussion instruments.

Igor Fedorovitee Stravinsky is a capable musician and composer, doubtless, but in putting out a work like the one under discussion it seems to us that at least he was sadly lacking in judgment. Possibly much better effects could be gotten with the same combination of instruments, but with a fewer number, say a double quintet, which would have given us greater clarity and more the effect of chamber music. Of course, considered as "ballet" music, with the stage settings, colorful costumes and other things that go with it, usually, possibly a different conception of the Stravinsky opus might be received, through eye as well as ear. But as it is the impression conveyed to us was that it is, at best, a "muddy" composition, not detracting from Mr. Stravinsky's ability as a composer. Then, again, it just might improve on a second hearing.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 14 -

Boston Programs.

To the music of Schubert, in commemoration of the centenary anniversary of the composer's death, Mr Koussevitzky turns for the programs for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. This time, contrary to the usual custom, there will be different programs on each occasion Mme. Lashanska will give songs with piano accompaniment at both of them. On Friday afternoon two Shubert symphonies will be played the Unfinished in B minor and the Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic."

For Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be the Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major and the Symphony No. 7 in C major. Thus will the anniversary be fittingly recognized.

THE OUTLOOK

PERHAPS the most interesting recital of the season so far was that given by Serge Koussevitsky. Mr. Koussevitsky has long been known here as the chef d'orchestre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time he chose to appear before us as a virtuoso of the double-bass, an instrument not generally regarded as a solo medium.

As a matter of fact this distinguished conductor was known to fame as a double-bass player long before he began to wield the bâton, and while Boston had had the opportunity to hear him in the rôle of soloist, it was the first time he had revealed that side of his musicianship to New York.

The audience, a large part of which came out of pure curiosity to see what could be done with the double-bass as a solo medium, was astonished at the beauty of tone extracted from the unwieldy-looking instrument by the maestro. The upper register had the quality of an exquisitely played cello and the most effective numbers were those utilizing that part of the instrument. Altogether the concert was a revelation of the hitherto unsuspected

THE SPUR

WHEN he came over here Serge Koussevitzky made such a hit in the conductor's chair, as the head of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, that only those with long musical memories thought of him as being a virtuoso in another field. So he made up his mind to show them, in both Boston and New York, that there were good enough reasons why he should have been introduced to the New World years ago as a player of the double-bass. The only thing against his appearance here then was apparently the feeling on the part of American managers that the double-bass, being larger than a 'cello and smaller than a piano, fell between two stools in the matter of concert size-rating.

Music Not and Comments

The Coming of the New York Philharmonic, Willem Mengelberg, Conducting—Shapiro String Quartet—Wagnerian Grand Opera To Be Here —Metropolitan Opera Conductors— Bolm Ballet to Appea...

By HARVEY GA...

One marvelous orchestra finishes and another comes in. Last week we had the superb Boston Symphony and this week, Friday and Saturday, we are to have the New York Philharmonic with Willem Mengelberg, conducting.

Before discussing the New York orchestra let us say an Ave and Vale to Serge Koussevitzky and his outstanding men. One hesitates to say that the Back Bay possesses the finest orchestra in the land, but one needn't stumble very much in saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is the finest exponent and interpreter of the moderns and ultra-modern schools.

His readings of Debussy, Maurice Ravel and Serge Prokofieff were revelations. Greater intimacy Debussy has never had and we fancy the Conc... Place Pig... him to an... ian readin...

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
CITY AUDITORIUM - JAN - 30

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Seymour is offering the Boston Symphony tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitsky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitsky as a virtuoso of the double bass in Carnegie Hall October 23d. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loveliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Olin Downes, New York Times:

"As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical [illegible] as at

ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS

NOV [illegible]

...minds —can any of them beat it.

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more classical variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

Has the Bass Viol B...

HOW many have read that delicious review of a Jascha Heifetz recital by Frank Sullivan in which the critic, foreseeing a glorious future for the violinist, prophesied that he would soon be able to play the 'cello and in time, if he persevered, would be able to master even the bass viol?

This calls to mind, for no reason at all, that Serge Koussevitzky, talented leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, carries the lone distinction of being the greatest player of the contra-bass in the world, and that he recently presented a successful recital on the ungainly fiddle in New York.

We had always conceived the bass viol as a grumpy, growling instrument doing all the heavy labor of the orchestra, but if we can believe Lawrence Gilman, Gotham critic, the contra-bass in the hands of Koussevitzky can "sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the 'cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of somber richness that no 'cello is able to attain."

We would like to hear a bass viol do that. It's difficult to overcome our conviction that the viol's vocabulary is not confined to "Ugh-ugh." What enterprising entrepreneur will be the first to sign up Koussevitzky for a Minneapolis recital?

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony concert for Hartford will be given in the Capitol theater on the afternoon of February 3, and Frank A. Sedgwick, who is presenting this concert, is offering tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats, for this supreme musical event. Koussevitzky will offer an interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as a virtuoso of the double-bass in Carnegie hall October 23. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loveliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Ticket sale now in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KENNE, N. H.
SENTINEL

NOV 6 - 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 7 - 1928

papils.

Boston Programs.

Back from a week's tour the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its home series of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The programs, unless Mr. Koussevitzky changes his intentions, will include the Five Indian Dances, Jacobi; the Symphony No. 3 in D major by Sibelius to be played for the first time in Boston; The Poem of Ecstasy, Scriabine.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV [illegible]

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Seymour is offering the Boston Symphony tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitsky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitsky as a virtuoso of the double bass in Carnegie Hall October 23d. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the lovliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Olin Downes, New York Times:

"As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical [illegible]

ASBURY PARK, N. J.
PRESS

NOV 8 1928

[illegible] can any of them beat it.

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more classical variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

NOV 9 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"AND at the close the listeners w[illegible] smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment most convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more highbrow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

NOV 9 1928

Miss [illegible] range the program for the meeting next Thursday.

Big Orchestra Goes Through.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, traveling in three large buses, passed through the city late yesterday afternoon, going west.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Music Not[illegible] and Comments

The Coming of the New York Philharmonic, Willem Mengelberg, Conducting—Shapiro String Quartet—Wagnerian Grand Opera To Be Here —Metropolitan Opera Conductors— Bolm Ballet to Appe[illegible]

By HARVEY GA[illegible]

One marvelous orchestra finishes and another comes in. Last week we had the superb Boston Symphony and this week, Friday and Saturday, we are to have the New York Philharmonic with Willem Mengelberg, conducting.

Before discussing the New York orchestra let us say an Ave and Vale to Serge Koussevitzky and his outstanding men. One hesitates to say that the Back Bay possesses the finest orchestra in the land, but one needn't stumble very much in saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is the finest exponent and interpreter of the moderns and ultra-modern schools.

His readings of Debussy, Maurice Ravel and Serge Prokofieff were revelations. Greater intimacy Debussy has never had and we fancy the Conc[illegible] Place Pig[illegible] him to an[illegible] ian readin[illegible]

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

Has the Bass Viol B[illegible]

HOW many have read that delicious review of a Jascha Heifetz recital by Frank Sullivan in which the critic, foreseeing a glorious future for the violinist, prophesied that he would soon be able to play the 'cello and in time, if he persevered, would be able to master even the bass viol?

This calls to mind, for no reason at all, that Serge Koussevitzky, talented leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, carries the lone distinction of being the greatest player of the contra-bass in the world, and that he recently presented a successful recital on the ungainly fiddle in New York.

We had always conceived the bass viol as a grumpy, growling instrument doing all the heavy labor of the orchestra, but if we can believe Lawrence Gilman, Gotham critic, the contra-bass in the hands of Koussevitzky can "sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the 'cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of somber richness that no 'cello is able to attain."

We would like to hear a bass viol do that. It's difficult to overcome our conviction that the viol's vocabulary is not confined to "Ugh-ugh." What enterprising entrepreneur will be the first to sign up Koussevitzky for a Minneapolis recital?

Music News, Views and Comment

Yost String Quartet to Inaugurate Series—Pittsburgh Symphony Calls Rehearsals; New York Philharmonic—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet; Here's Opportunity for Composers.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

ONE may listen with pleasure, through an hour and a half, or so, to a string quartet ensemble, and derive considerable enjoyment therefrom. But when it comes to a stringed orchestra, meaning the usual string quintet, multiplied to eight basses, about four times that number of violins, eight violoncelli and a dozen violas, the time of enjoyment—that is, of real enjoyment—would be pared down very considerably. That's just what happened when the Boston Symphony orchestra, a week ag[illegible] played Stravinsky's "Appollon Musagete" ballet, in two scenes and some eight different moods. After a half hour of music from such a combination, although no one could find fault with the playing, nor with the effects that were gotten by this very fine stringed section of the orchestra, it was rather tiresome long before the close of the offering, which seemed interminably lengthy, without the relief colorings provided by wind and percussion instruments.

Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky is a capable musician and composer, doubtless, but in putting out a work like the one under discussion it seems to us that at least he was sadly lacking in judgment. Possibly much better effects could be gotten with the same combination of instruments, but with a fewer number, say a double quintet, which would have given us greater clarity and more the effect of chamber music. Of course, considered as "ballet" music, with the stage settings, colorful costumes and other things that go with it, usually, possibly a different conception of the Stravinsky opus might be received through eye as well as ear. But as it is the impression conveyed to us was that it is, at best, a "muddy" composition, not detracting from Mr. Stravinsky's ability as a composer. Then, again, it just might improve on a second hearing.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
CITY AUDITORIUM - JAN. [illegible]

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony concert for Hartford will be given in the Capitol theater on the afternoon of February 3, and Frank A. Sedgwick, who is presenting this concert, is offering tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats, for this supreme musical event. Koussevitzky will offer an interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as a virtuoso of the double-bass in Carnegie hall October 23. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loveliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Ticket sale now in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 14 1928

Boston Programs.

To the music of Schubert, in commemoration of the centenary anniversary of the composer's death, Mr Koussevitzky turns for the programs for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. This time, contrary to the usual custom, there will be different programs on each occasion Mme. Lashanska will give songs with piano accompaniment at both of them. On Friday afternoon two Shubert symphonies will be played the Unfinished in B minor and the Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic."

For Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be the Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major and the Symphony No. 7 in C major. Thus will the anniversary be fittingly recognized.

THE OUTLOOK

PERHAPS the most interesting recital of the season so far was that given by Serge Koussevitsky. Mr. Koussevitsky has long been known here as the chef d'orchestre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time he chose to appear before us as a virtuoso of the double-bass, an instrument not generally regarded as a solo medium.

As a matter of fact this distinguished conductor was known to fame as a double-bass player long before he began to wield the bâton, and while Boston had had the opportunity to hear him in the rôle of soloist, it was the first time he had revealed that side of his musicianship to New York.

The audience, a large part of which came out of pure curiosity to see what could be done with the double-bass as a solo medium, was astonished at the beauty of tone extracted from the unwieldy-looking instrument by the maestro. The upper register had the quality of an exquisitely played cello and the most effective numbers were those utilizing that part of the instrument. Altogether the concert was a revelation of the hitherto unsuspected

THE SPUR

WHEN he came over here Serge Koussevitzky made such a hit in the conductor's chair, as the head of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, that only those with long musical memories thought of him as being a virtuoso in another field. So he made up his mind to show them, in both Boston and New York, that there were good enough reasons why he should have been introduced to the New World years ago as a player of the double-bass. The only thing against his appearance here then was apparently the feeling on the part of American managers that the double-bass, being larger than a 'cello and smaller than a piano, fell between two stools in the matter of concert size-rating.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KENNE, N. H.
SENTINEL

NOV 6 - 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more high-brow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 7 - 1928

pupils.

Boston Programs.

Back from a week's tour the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its home [illegible] of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The programs, unless Mr. Koussevitzky changes his intentions, will include the Five Indian Dances, Jacobi; the Symphony No. 3 in D major by Sibelius to be played for the first time in Boston; The Poem of Ecstasy, Scriabine.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

[illegible]

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Seymour is offering the Boston Symphony tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitsky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitsky as a virtuoso of the double bass in Carnegie Hall October 23d. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the lovliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Olin Downes, New York Times:

"As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics, but purely as an integral part of the musical expression."

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

[illegible]re all smiling
[illegible]t convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more classical variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

NOV 9 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"AND at the close the listeners w[illegible] smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment most convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more high-brow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

NOV 9 1928

[illegible] range the program for the meeting next Thursday.

Big Orchestra Goes Through.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, traveling in three large buses, passed through the city late yesterday afternoon, going west.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

Music Not[illegible] and Comments

The Coming of the New York Philharmonic, Willem Mengelberg, Conducting—Shapiro String Quartet—Wagnerian Grand Opera To Be Here —Metropolitan Opera Conductors— Bolm Ballet to Appe[illegible]

By HARVEY GA[illegible]

One marvelous orchestra finishes and another comes in. Last week we had the superb Boston Symphony and this week, Friday and Saturday, we are to have the New York Philharmonic with Willem Mengelberg, conducting.

Before discussing the New York orchestra let us say an Ave and Vale to Serge Koussevitzky and his outstanding men. One hesitates to say that the Back Bay possesses the finest orchestra in the land, but one needn't stumble very much in saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is the finest exponent and interpreter of the moderns and ultra-modern schools.

His readings of Debussy, Maurice Ravel and Serge Prokofieff were revelations. Greater intimacy Debussy has never had and we fancy the Concerts Iameroux and the Place Pigalle would have applauded him to an echo for those Debussyian readings.

[illegible]digned?

[illegible]eview of a [illegible] Sullivan in which the critic, foreseeing a glorious future for the violinist, prophesied that he would soon be able to play the 'cello and in time, if he persevered, would be able to master even the bass viol?

This calls to mind, for no reason at all, that Serge Koussevitzky, talented leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, carries the lone distinction of being the greatest player of the contra-bass in the world, and that he recently presented a successful recital on the ungainly fiddle in New York.

We had always conceived the bass viol as a grumpy, growling instrument doing all the heavy labor of the orchestra, but if we can believe Lawrence Gilman, Gotham critic, the contra-bass in the hands of Koussevitzky can "sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the 'cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of somber richness that no 'cello is able to attain."

We would like to hear a bass viol do that. It's difficult to overcome our conviction that the viol's vocabulary is not confined to "Ugh-ugh." What enterprising entrepreneur will be the first to sign up Koussevitzky for a Minneapolis recital?

Music News, Views and Comment

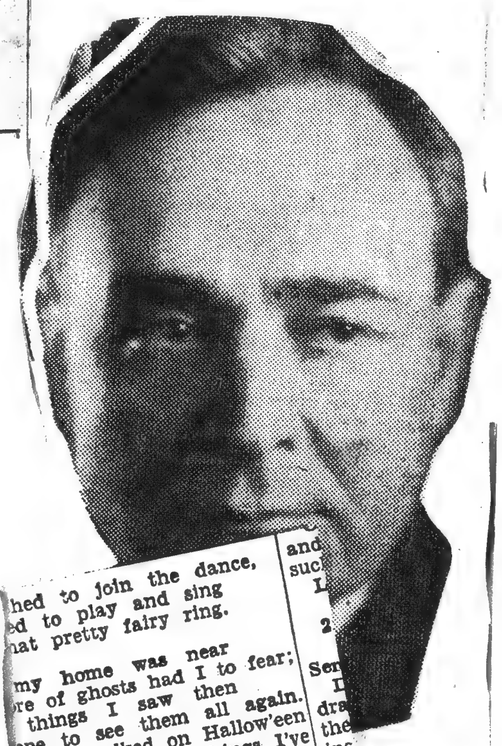
Yost String Quartet to Inaugurate Series—Pittsburgh Symphony Calls Rehearsals; New York Philharmonic—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet; Here's Opportunity for Composers.

By WILLIAM R. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

ONE may listen with pleasure, through an hour and a half, or so, to a string quartet ensemble, and derive considerable enjoyment therefrom. But when it comes to a stringed orchestra, meaning the usual string quintet, multiplied to eight basses, about four times that number of violins, eight violoncelli and a dozen violas, the time of enjoyment—that is, of real enjoyment—would be pared down very considerably. That's just what happened when the Boston Symphony orchestra, a week ag[illegible] played Stravinsky's "Appollon Musagete" ballet, in two scenes and some eight different moods. After a half hour of music from such a combination, although no one could find fault with the playing, nor with the effects that were gotten by this very fine stringed section of the orchestra, it was rather tiresome long before the close of the offering, which seemed interminably lengthy, without the relief colorings provided by wind and percussion instruments.

Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky is a capable musician and composer, doubtless, but in putting out a work like the one under discussion it seems to us that at least he was sadly lacking in judgment. Possibly much better effects could be gotten with the same combination of instruments, but with a fewer number, say a double quintet, which would have given us greater clarity and more the effect of chamber music. Of course, considered as "ballet" music, with the stage settings, colorful costumes and other things that go with it, usually, possibly a different conception of the Stravinsky opus might be received, through eye as well as ear. But as it is the impression conveyed to us was that it is, at best, a "muddy" composition, not detracting from Mr. Stravinsky's ability as a composer. Then, again, it just might improve on a second hearing.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH



[illegible]hed to join the dance,
[illegible]ed to play and sing
[illegible]hat pretty fairy ring.

[illegible]my home was near
[illegible]re of ghosts had I to fear;
[illegible] things I saw then
[illegible]ope to see them all again.
[illegible]glad I walked on Hallow'een
[illegible]remember all the things I've

[illegible]ORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony concert for Hartford will be given in the Capitol theater on the afternoon of February 3, and Frank A. Sedgwick, who is presenting this concert, is offering tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats, for this supreme musical event. Koussevitzky will offer an interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as a virtuoso of the double-bass in Carnegie hall October 23. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loveliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Ticket sale now in progress at McCoy's, inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 14 1928

Boston Programs.

To the music of Schubert, in commemoration of the centenary anniversary of the composer's death, Mr Koussevitzky turns for the programs for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. This time, contrary to the usual custom, there will be different programs on each occasion Mme. Lashanska will give songs with piano accompaniment at both of them. On Friday afternoon two Shubert symphonies will be played the Unfinished in B minor and the Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic."

For Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be the Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major and the Symphony No. 7 in C major. Thus will the anniversary be fittingly recognized.

THE OUTLOOK

[illegible]

PERHAPS the most interesting recital of the season so far was that given by Serge Koussevitsky. Mr. Koussevitsky has long been known here as the chef d'orchestre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time he chose to appear before us as a virtuoso of the double-bass, an instrument not generally regarded as a solo medium.

As a matter of fact this distinguished conductor was known to fame as a double-bass player long before he began to wield the bâton, and while Boston had had the opportunity to hear him in the rôle of soloist, it was the first time he had revealed that side of his musicianship to New York.

The audience, a large part of which came out of pure curiosity to see what could be done with the double-bass as a solo medium, was astonished at the beauty of tone extracted from the unwieldy-looking instrument by the maestro. The upper register had the quality of an exquisitely played cello and the most effective numbers were those utilizing that part of the instrument. Altogether the concert was a revelation of the hitherto unsuspected

THE SPUR

WHEN he came over here Serge Koussevitzky made such a hit in the conductor's chair, as the head of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, that only those with long musical memories thought of him as being a virtuoso in another field. So he made up his mind to show them, in both Boston and New York, that there were good enough reasons why he should have been introduced to the New World years ago as a player of the double-bass. The only thing against his appearance here then was apparently the feeling on the part of American managers that the double-bass, being larger than a 'cello and smaller than a piano, fell between two stools in the matter of concert size-rating.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KENNE, N. H.
SENTINEL

NOV 6 - 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"And at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more high-brow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

SUN
BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
NOV 9 1928

SMILING MUSIC

"AND at the close the listeners were all smiling broadly, which betokens enjoyment most convincingly enough."

This does not refer to a political rally—not even a Rogers rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. One more guess?

It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more high-brow variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

Music News, Views and Comment

Yost String Quartet to Inaugurate Series—Pittsburgh Symphony Calls Rehearsals; New York Philharmonic—Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Ballet; Here's Opportunity for Composers.

By WILLIAM E. MITCHEL,
Press Music Critic.

ONE may listen with pleasure, through an hour and a half, or so to a string quartet ensemble, and derive considerable enjoyment therefrom. But when it comes to a scrunged orchestra, meaning the usual string quintet, multiplied several times, about four times the number of violins, eight violoncelli and a dozen violas, the time of enjoyment—that is, of real enjoyment—would be pared down very considerably. That's just what happened when the Boston Symphony orchestra, a week ago [illegible] played Stravinsky's "Appollon Musagete" ballet, in two scenes and some eight different moods. After a half hour of music from such a combination, although no one could find fault with the playing, nor with the effects that were gotten by this very fine stringed section of the orchestra, it was rather tiresome long before the close of the offering, which seemed interminably lengthy, without the relief [illegible] provided by wind and percussion instruments.

Igor Fedorovitch Stravinsky is a capable musician and composer, doubtless, but in putting out a work like the one under discussion it seems to us that at least he was sadly lacking in judgment. Possibly much better effects could be gotten with the same combination of instruments, but with a fewer number, say a double quintet, which would have given us greater clarity and more the effect of chamber music. Of course, considered as "ballet" music, with the stage settings, colorful costumes and other things that go with it, usually, possibly a different conception of the Stravinsky opus might be received through eye as well as ear. But as it is the impression conveyed to us was that it is, at best, a "muddy" composition, not detracting from Mr. Stravinsky's ability as a composer. Then, again, it just might improve on a second hearing.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 14 1928

Boston Programs.

To the music of Schubert, in commemoration of the centenary anniversary of the composer's death, Mr Koussevitzky turns for the programs for the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. This time, contrary to the usual custom, there will be different programs on each occasion. Mme. Lashanska will give songs with piano accompaniment at both of them. On Friday afternoon two Shubert symphonies will be played, the Unfinished in B minor and the Symphony No. 4 in C minor, the "Tragic."

For Saturday evening the orchestral numbers will be the Symphony No. 5, in B-flat major and the Symphony No. 7 in C major. Thus will the anniversary be fittingly recognized.

THE OUTLOOK

NOV 14 1928

PERHAPS the most interesting recital of the season so far was that given by Serge Koussevitsky. Mr. Koussevitsky has long been known here as the chef d'orchestre of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but this time he chose to appear before us as a virtuoso of the double-bass, an instrument not generally regarded as a solo medium.

As a matter of fact this distinguished conductor was known to fame as a double-bass player long before he began to wield the bâton, and while Boston had had the opportunity to hear him in the rôle of soloist, it was the first time he had revealed that side of his musicianship to New York.

The audience, a large part of which came out of pure curiosity to see what could be done with the double-bass as a solo medium, was astonished at the beauty of tone extracted from the unwieldy-looking instrument by the maestro. The upper register had the quality of an exquisitely played cello and the most effective numbers were those utilizing that part of the instrument. Altogether the concert was a revelation of the hitherto unsuspected

---

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 7 - 1928

Boston Programs.

Back from a week's tour the Boston Symphony orchestra resumes its home [illegible] of concerts on Friday and Saturday. The programs, unless Mr. Koussevitzky changed his intentions, will include the Five Indian Dances, Jacobi; the Symphony No. 8 in D major by Sibelius to be played for the first time in Boston; The Poem of Ecstasy, Scriabine.

SUN
WILLIAMSPORT, PA.
NOV 9 1928

[illegible] range the program for the meeting next Thursday.

Big Orchestra Goes Through.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, traveling in three large buses, passed through the city late yesterday afternoon, going west.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 8 - 1928

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Seymour is offering the Boston Symphony tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats. In bringing the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Hartford, a real musical event is promised which will stand out pre-eminent among the season's musical attractions. Mr. Koussevitsky can be relied upon to furnish a most interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitsky as a virtuoso of the double bass in Carnegie Hall October 23d. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loviest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Olin Downes, New York Times:

"As soon as Mr. Koussevitzky played his opening phrase, he had commanded the attention of the audience. Thereafter the listener surrendered himself to an astonishing exhibition. Everything the double-bass is supposed to do, and many things it was not expected to do, were brought to pass, and this without the suggestion of ostentation or technical gymnastics, but purely as an integral part of the musical expression."

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE

NOV 10

Music Notes and Comments

The Coming of the New York Philharmonic, Willem Mengelberg, Conducting—Shapiro String Quartet—Wagnerian Grand Opera To Be Here—Metropolitan Opera Conductors—Bolm Ballet to Appear

By HARVEY GA[illegible]

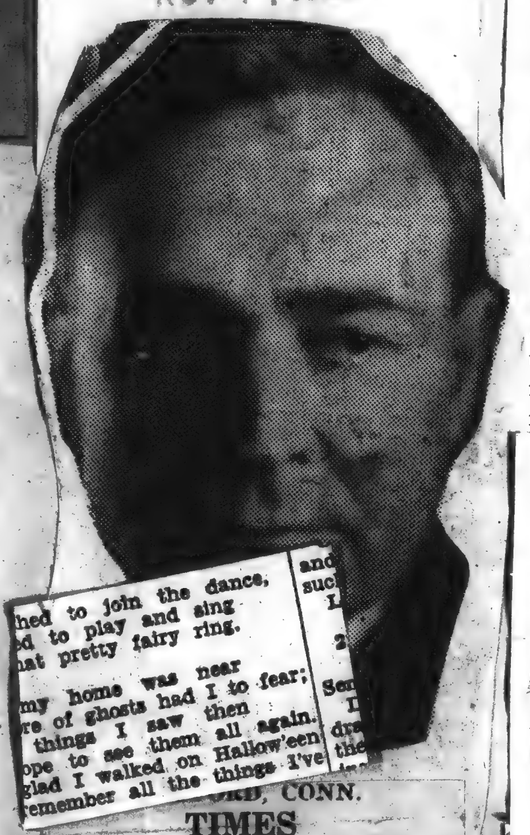
One marvelous orchestra finishes and another comes in. Last week we had the superb Boston Symphony and this week, Friday and Saturday, we are to have the New York Philharmonic with Willem Mengelberg, conducting.

Before discussing the New York orchestra let us say an Ave and Vale to Serge Koussevitzky and his outstanding [illegible]. One hesitates to say that the Back Bay possesses the finest orchestra in the land, but one needn't stumble very much in saying that Mr. Koussevitzky is the finest exponent and interpreter of the moderns and ultra-moderns schools.

His readings of Debussy, Maurice Ravel and Serge Prokofieff were revelations. Greater intimacy Debussy has never had and we fancy the Concerts Iameroux and the Place Pigalle would have applauded him to an echo for those Debussyian readings.

RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH

NOV 11 1928



[illegible]hed to join the dance,
[illegible]d to play and sing
[illegible]at pretty fairy ring.

[illegible]my home was near
[illegible]re of ghosts had I to fear;
[illegible]things I saw then
[illegible]ope to see them all again.
[illegible]glad I walked on Hallow'een
[illegible]remember all the things I've

[illegible]RD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 15 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony concert for Hartford will be given in the Capitol theater on the afternoon of February 3, and Frank A. Sedgwick, who is presenting this concert, is offering tickets at this time in order to give the musical public a choice of seats, for this supreme musical event. Koussevitzky will offer an interesting program.

The musical sensation of the year in New York was the first appearance of Serge Koussevitzky as a virtuoso of the double-bass in Carnegie hall October 23. New York had heard fabulous tales of the Boston Symphony conductor's unbelievable power of coaxing the loveliest and most delicate tones from this unwieldy giant of the string instruments. Perhaps no one in the audience had heard the double-bass except in the background of symphony concerts. It was a huge, a curious and a musically distinguished audience which awaited Koussevitzky's appearance Tuesday night. The endless applause and the rhapsodies of each critic tells how completely Koussevitzky conquered New York.

Ticket sale now in progress at McCoy's, Inc., No. 89 Asylum street.

THE SPUR

NOV 15 1928

WHEN he came over here Serge Koussevitzky made such a hit in the conductor's chair, as the head of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, that only those with long musical memories thought of him as being a virtuoso in another field. So he made up his mind to show them, in both Boston and New York, that there were good enough reasons why he should have been introduced to the New World years ago as a player of the double-bass. The only thing against his appearance here then was apparently the feeling on the part of American managers that the double-bass, being larger than a 'cello and smaller than a piano, fell between two stools in the matter of concert size-rating.

[illegible]igned?

[illegible]eview of a [illegible]ullivan in [illegible] the critic, foreseeing a glorious future for the violinist, prophesied that he would soon be able to play the 'cello and in time, if he persevered, would be able to master even the bass viol?

This calls to mind, for no reason at all, that Serge Koussevitzky, talented leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, carries the lone distinction of being the greatest player of the contra-bass in the world, and that he recently presented a successful recital on the ungainly fiddle in New York.

We had always conceived the bass viol as a grumpy, growling instrument doing all the heavy labor of the orchestra, but if we can believe Lawrence Gilman, Gotham critic, the contra-bass in the hands of Koussevitzky can "sing with pride and independence and lyric fervor, with something of the 'cello's poignantly vibrant utterance in its upper register, yet with a fullness of body, a dark and beautiful austerity, and an amplitude of somber richness that no 'cello is able to attain."

We would like to hear a bass viol do that. It's difficult to overcome our conviction that the viol's vocabulary is not confined to "Ugh-ugh." What enterprising entrepreneur will be the first to sign up successfully for a Minneapolis re[illegible]

[illegible]re all smiling [illegible] convincingly

This does not refer to a political rally. It does not refer to a movie or stage show. It was the close of a symphony, composed by a Russian modern and played by the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Perhaps more people would go to symphony concerts if they realized that there is excellent music which can make listeners smile broadly now and then, or perhaps weep a little.

As a matter of fact, more people are going to such concerts these days than ever before. Jazz thrives, but so, also, does the more classical variety of music. This is a great age for "trying anything once," even to symphony music, art and literature. The best part of it is that, having tried some of these things, of which it used to be afraid, the public is finding unexpected enjoyment.

213

Cleveland Town Topics

MUSIC

Edited by ALICE BRADLEY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

SUCH enthusiasm as is seldom manifested in a Cleveland concert hall stirred the echoes in Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening when Serge Koussevitzky, at the head of the one hundred and ten players of the Boston symphony orchestra, presented music of Russian and French composers for the program's first half, and after the intermission, read for us in thrilling fashion the symphony in D Major by that giant who stood at the end of the German romantics, Johannes Brahms. Koussevitzky is a conductor of vivid imagination, evidently a drill master with absolute authority over his men, and his musicians are virtuosos of the first rank. With the most delicate balance between the orchestral choirs, perfect precision, roundness and smoothness of tone, there seemed to be but one voice in the entire mass.

The program was fascinating in its contrasts. Prokofieff's suite of short numbers which he dubs a "classical" symphony is a delicious bit of imitative fantasy. Played with the utmost delicacy and abandon, it at once puts the audience in cheery mood. Next came Dubussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" in a highly poetic reading, then the second Ballet Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" which in Koussevitzky's New York concerts has created a veritable furore—and with good reason, for a more brillaint piece of orchestral virtuosity it would be hard to imagine. Koussevitzky plays upon his band as on a solo instrument and the response of his musicians is as marvelous as the conception of the conductor.

The same enchanting effect came in the Allegretto of the symphony where the rapidly changing moods were beautifully contrasted in gradations of light and shade. They faded away—they arose in fresh color—there was utmost flexibility in the orchestral performance and Brahms plus Koussevitzky is a delectable combination, something new even in music that has long stood the test of time.

A word for the Cleveland audience—one of much distinction, it is educated by the superlatively fine performances at its own symphony concerts to appreciate the transcendant beauty in the playing of this world famous group of musical giants. It applauded as never before, recalling the conductor again and again, who shared the applause many times with his expert players. It was an exciting concert and an artistic joy to be a part of it.

TIMES
Montclair N.J.
1
NOV 17 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT WEEK

Annual Visit to Montclair Being Made Under Auspices of Unity Institute.

LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert next Wednesday evening in Unity Concert Course at the Montclair High School. This great orchestra is appearing under its magnetic leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The house is sold out except for standing room, which can be had at No. 67 Church street or at the door the night of the concert. The concert begins at 8:30 promptly and the doors will be closed against all late comers until such time as the director permits a pause in the program.

Following is the program: Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72. Schumann: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38; I, Andante poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace; II, Larghetto; III, Scherzo, molto vivace; trio I, molto piu vivace; trio II; IV, Allegro animato e grazioso. Stravinsky: "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses), ballet; Scene I, birth of Apollo; scene II, variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses)—variation of Polymnia—variation of terpsichore—variation of Apollo—Apollo and terpsichore—Coda (Apollo and the Muses)—Apotheosis. Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

NEW YORK
EVE. POST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce to New York at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score "Apollon Musagete," "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston, October 12 and 13. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestra is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the girth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations the god's encounters with the three muses —Polymnia, Terpischore and Calliope. The program also includes Schumann's Symphony in B flat major and Brahms's Second Symphony.

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitzky will give Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, in which the contemporary Russian composer has fancifully imitated the forms of the eighteenth century. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
NOV 17 1928

Boston Symphony Here Nov. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will then perform two works of Beethoven with which he also opened his Boston season.

The program will open with Beethoven's "Overture to Leonore, No. 3" Overture and close with the "Eroica" Symphony. French music will be represented by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the verses of Mallarme, and Russian music by the "Classical" Symphony of Serge Prokofieff.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 17 1928

SYMPHONY WILL OPEN PROVIDENCE SEASON ON DEC. 4

Other Concerts Will Be Presented Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. — Season Tickets Will Go on Sale Here Week from Monday.

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, with a concert in the Albee Theatre. Other concerts will be Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

This is the 48th season of the orchestra, and the fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky. It is expected the present season will be one of the most brilliant in the history of the organization.

Season tickets which have not been engaged from last year will go on sale at Steinert's music store a week fom Monday. Inquiries may be addresesd to Symphony Hall, Boston.

The orchestra's New York season will open with a concert Thursday evening.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season Tuesday evening, Dec. 4. The schedule includes concerts on Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possible the use of the Albee Theatre, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra and the fifth under Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's, a week from Monday. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston. The number of seats released last spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE DEC. 4

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season which is also to include concerts on Jan. 15, Feb 19 and March 26. Mr. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possible the use of the Albee Theatre, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra, and the fifth under

The Boston Symphony's first Providence concert this season is an event that casts its shadow before in an announcement of today. The orchestra comes here the first week of December, over a month later than last year. Up until then Providence will be afforded recitals of wide interest and importance, some of the programs being listed this week. This is the official week of the Schubert centennial anniversary in which observances by musicians all over the world will be concentrated. Officially and unofficially music lovers in Providence are joining in the movement in honor of the composer.

PROV JOURNAL NOV 18

New York Telegraph
NOV 17 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their New York season with two concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 22, and Saturday afternoon, November 24.

At the Thursday concert, Koussevitsky will introduce to New York the music which Stravinsky composed last season for his ballet, "Apollo Musagete," "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." The score is for string orchestra and had its first concert performances in Boston under this conductor. The Thursday programme also includes Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitsky will repeat Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, in which the contemporary Russian composer has fancifully imitated the forms of the eighteenth century. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun,' Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 17 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce to New York at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollo Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses").

Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston Oct. 12 and 13. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's chamber music festival in the Library Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestration is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations the god's encounters with the three muses — Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. The style is of classical simplicity. The program:

Apollo Musagete, Ballet.....Stravinsky
Scene I. Birth of Apollo.
Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses). Variation of Polymnia. Variation of Terpsichore. Variation of Apollo. Apollo and Terpsichore. Coda (Apollo and the Muses). Apotheosis.
Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1, Op. 38.....Schumann
I. Andante poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace, Trio I. Molto piu vivace, Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54..Scriabin

There will be an intermission after the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Conducting Boston Symphony, Carnegie, Thursday.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Season Opens Soon

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season which is also to include concerts on Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. Mr. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possible the use of the Albee Theater, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra, and the fifth under Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October, in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's, a week from to-morrow. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston. The number of seats released last Spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

BROOKLYN EAGLE

On Thursday evening and Friday afternoon of this week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first New York appearances this season. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. His Thursday evening program includes a first performance in this city of the Strawinsky ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," composed for the Library of Congress and first given in Washington during the spring of this year. The complete Thursday program is:

Schumann ..... Symphonk in B-flat
Strawinsky ..... "Apollo, Musagetes"
Scriabin ..... "La poeme de l'extase"

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra will offer the following selection:

Prokofieff ..... Classical Symphony
Debussy ..... "L'apres-midi d'un faune"
Strawinsky ..... "Petrouschka"
Brahms ..... Second Symphony

The program for the Friday evening concert of the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be found elsewhere on this page.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York, at the opening Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollon Musagètes" or "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." The Russian conductor was the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall when he played it at concerts in Boston on Oct. 12 and 13.

Stravinsky's ballet was first produced at Mrs. E. S. Coolidge's chamber music festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June.

The entire orchestration is for strings and the work is in the musical variation form. The theme first stated represents the birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations depict the god's encounters with three of the muses, Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. A program note adds that "the style is of classical simplicity."

213

Cleveland Town Topics

MUSIC

Edited by ALICE BRADLEY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

SUCH enthusiasm as is seldom manifested in a Cleveland concert hall stirred the echoes in Masonic Auditorium on Wednesday evening when Serge Koussevitzky, at the head of the one hundred and ten players of the Boston symphony orchestra, presented music of Russian and French composers for the program's first half, and after the intermission, read for us in thrilling fashion the symphony in D Major by that giant who stood at the end of the German romantics, Johannes Brahms. Koussevitzky is a conductor of vivid imagination, evidently a drill master with absolute authority over his men, and his musicians are virtuosos of the first rank. With the most delicate balance between the orchestral choirs, perfect precision, roundness and smoothness of tone, there seemed to be but one voice in the entire mass.

The program was fascinating in its contrasts. Prokofieff's suite of short numbers which he dubs a "classical" symphony is a delicious bit of imitative fantasy. Played with the utmost delicacy and abandon, it at once puts the audience in cheery mood. Next came Dubussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun" in a highly poetic reading, then the second Ballet Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" which in Koussevitzky's New York concerts has created a veritable furore—and with good reason, for a more brillaint piece of orchestral virtuosity it would be hard to imagine. Koussevitzky plays upon his band as on a solo instrument and the response of his musicians is as marvelous as the conception of the conductor.

The same enchanting effect came in the Allegretto of the symphony where the rapidly changing moods were beautifully contrasted in gradations of light and shade. They faded away—they arose in fresh color—there was utmost flexibility in the orchestral performance and Brahms plus Koussevitzky is a delectable combination, something new even in music that has long stood the test of time.

A word for the Cleveland audience—one of much distinction, it is educated by the superlatively fine performances at its own symphony concerts to appreciate the transcendant beauty in the playing of this world famous group of musical giants. It applauded as never before, recalling the conductor again and again, who shared the applause many times with his expert players. It was an exciting concert and an artistic joy to be a part of it.

TIMES
Montclair N.J.
NOV 17 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT WEEK

Annual Visit to Montclair Being Made Under Auspices of Unity Institute.

LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its annual concert next Wednesday evening in Unity Concert Course at the Montclair High School. This great orchestra is appearing under its magnetic leader, Serge Koussevitzky. The house is sold out except for standing room, which can be had at No. 67 Church street or at the door the night of the concert. The concert begins at 8:30 promptly and the doors will be closed against all late comers until such time as the director permits a pause in the program.

Following is the program: Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72. Schumann: Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, Op. 38; I, Andante poco maestoso, allegro molto vivace; II, Larghetto; III, Scherzo, molto vivace; trio I, molto piu vivace; trio II; IV, Allegro animato e grazioso. Stravinsky: "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses), ballet; Scene I, birth of Apollo; scene II, variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses)—variation of Polymnia—variation of terpsichore—variation of Apollo—Apollo and terpsichore—Coda (Apollo and the Muses)—Apotheosis. Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."

NEW YORK
EVE. POST
NOV 17 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce to New York at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score "Apollon Musagete," "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston, October 12 and 13. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestra is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the girth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations the god's encounters with the three muses —Polymnia, Terpischore and Calliope. The program also includes Schumann's Symphony in B flat major and Brahms's Second Symphony.

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitzky will give Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, in which the contemporary Russian composer has fancifully imitated the forms of the eighteenth century. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

BROOKLYN
STANDARD UNION
NOV 17 1928

Boston Symphony Here Nov. 23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Brooklyn season at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Serge Koussevitsky will then perform two works of Beethoven with which he also opened his Boston season.

The program will open with Beethoven's "Overture to Leonore, No. 3" Overture and close with the "Erofca" Symphony. French music will be represented by Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," inspired by the verses of Mallarme, and Russian music by the "Classical" Symphony of Serge Prok[illegible].

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 17 1928

SYMPHONY WILL OPEN PROVIDENCE SEASON ON DEC. 4

Other Concerts Will Be Presented Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.—Season Tickets Will Go on Sale Here Week from Monday.

The Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, with a concert in the Albee Theatre. Other concerts will be Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26.

This is the 48th season of the orchestra, and the fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky. It is expected the present season will be one of the most brilliant in the history of the organization.

Season tickets which have not been engaged from last year will go on sale at Steinert's music store a week fom Monday. Inquiries may be addresesd to Symphony Hall, Boston.

The orchestra's New York season will open with a concert Thursday evening.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 17 1928

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season Tuesday evening, Dec. 4. The schedule includes concerts on Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possible the use of the Albee Theatre, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra and the fifth under Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's, a week from Monday. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston. The number of seats released last spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
NEWS
NOV 17 1928

SYMPHONY TO OPEN SEASON HERE DEC. 4

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its Providence season which is also to include concerts on Jan. 15, Feb 19 and March 26. Mr. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possiblo the use of the Albee Theatre, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra, and the fifth under

The Boston Symphony's first Providence concert this season is an event that casts its shadow before in an announcement of today. The orchestra comes here the first week of December, over a month later than last year. Up until then Providence will be afforded recitals of wide interest and importance, some of the programs being listed this week. This is the official week of the Schubert centennial anniversary in which observances by musicians all over the world will be concentrated. Officially and unofficially music lovers in Providence are joining in the movement in honor of the composer.

PROV JOURNAL Nov 18

New York Telegraph
NOV 18 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open their New York season with two concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 22, and Saturday afternoon, November 24.

At the Thursday concert, Koussevitsky will introduce to New York the music which Stravinsky composed last season for his ballet, "Apollo Musagete," "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." The score is for string orchestra and had its first concert performances in Boston under this conductor. The Thursday programme also includes Schumann's Symphony in B-flat major, No. 1, and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

At the Saturday matinee, Koussevitsky will repeat Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, in which the contemporary Russian composer has fancifully imitated the forms of the eighteenth century. The remaining numbers will be Debussy's "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite, and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 18 1928

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce to New York at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollo Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses").

Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston Oct. 12 and 13. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's chamber music festival in the Library Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestration is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations the god's encounters with the three muses — Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. The style is of classical simplicity. The program:

Apollo Musagete, Ballet.....Stravinsky
Scene I. Birth of Apollo.
Scene II. Variation of Apollo (Apollo and the Muses). Variation of Polymnia. Variation of Terpsichore. Variation of Apollo. Apollo and Terpsichore. Coda (Apollo and the Muses). Apotheosis.
Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1, Op. 38.....Schumann
I. Andante poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace, Trio I. Molto piu vivace, Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.
"The Poem of Ecstasy," Op. 54..Scriabin

There will be an intermission after the symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph
NOV 18 1928

SERGE KOUSSE-VITZKY, Boston Symphony, Carnegie, Thursday. ducting Boston

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE
NOV 18 1928

Boston Symphony Season Opens Soon

On Tuesday evening, Dec. 4, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its Providence season which is also to include concerts on Jan. 15, Feb. 19 and March 26. Mr. E. F. Albee and the generous efforts of Providence citizens again made possible the use of the Albee Theater, pending the completion of the new auditorium.

The present season is the 48th of the orchestra, and the fifth under Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October, in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinert's, a week from to-morrow. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony Hall, Boston. The number of seats released last Spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 18

On Thursday evening and Friday afternoon of this week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first New York appearances this season. Mr. Koussewitsky will conduct. His Thursday evening program includes a first performance in this city of the Strawinsky ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," composed for the Library of Congress and first given in Washington during the spring of this year. The complete Thursday program is:

Schumann .....Symphony in B-flat
Strawinsky .....'Apollo, Musagetes"
Scriabin .....'La poeme de l'extase"

On Saturday afternoon Mr. Koussewitsky and his orchestra will offer the following selection:

Prokofieff .....Classical Symphony
Debussy .....'L'apres-midi d'un faune"
Strawinsky .....'Petrouschka"
Brahms .....Second Symphony

The program for the Friday evening concert of the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be found elsewhere on this page.

* * *

NEW YORK TIMES

NOV 18 1928

Serge Koussevitzky will introduce to New York, at the opening Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollon Musagètes" or "Apollo, Leader of the Muses." The Russian conductor was the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall when he played it at concerts in Boston on Oct. 12 and 13.

Stravinsky's ballet was first produced at Mrs. E. S. Coolidge's chamber music festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June.

The entire orchestration is for strings and the work is in the musical variation form. The theme first stated represents the birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations depict the god's encounters with three of the muses, Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. A program note adds that "the style is of classical simplicity."

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gives the opening concert of its Brooklyn [illegible] at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, next Friday evening, Nov. 23. Mr. Koussevitsky will offer the following program: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," Debussy; "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25, Prokofieff; Symphony No. 3 in E flat major, "Eroica," Op. 55, Bee[illegible]

Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October, in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinerts, a week from Monday. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony hall, Boston. The number of seats released last spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 21 1928

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Sedgwick is offering to reserve tickets for his patrons, which will be held until the 20th of January. Just phone 2-2251 and secure good locations at this time.

Quoting from The Courant review of last year's concert, Walter Brown wrote:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played magnificently at the Capitol Theater yesterday and music lovers who failed to attend missed one of the greatest of musical events; for the coming of a great orchestra is an outstanding event in the musical history of any city, and Hartford has all too few orchestral concerts.

"The orchestra was in fine form and Mr. Koussevitzky again showed not only his grace and charm of direction but his splendid sense of values and his eloquent uses of contrasts in his readings. The audience was of large size and extraordinarily enthusiastic and at the conclusion of the concert the conductor was called again and again to the stage, the members of the orchestra rising to receive the applause with him.

"Mr. Sedgwick is to be thanked for bringing the Boston orchestra here for the concert."

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's Inc, 89 Asylum Street

New York Telegraph

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce [illegible] New York, at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollon Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"). Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston last month. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestration is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the Birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations are the god's encounters with the three muses—Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. The style is of classical simplicity.

Further, the program includes Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. During the Saturday matinee, the Boston Symphony will play "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROG
PROGRAM ANNOUNCED JOURNAL

Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofieff will occupy the first part and a Brahms symphony the last part of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer for its inaugural program here this season on Dec. 4. The order is announced as follows:

NOV 28

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), eclogue by S. Mallarme, Debussy; "Classical," Symphony, opus 25, Prokofieff, Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotte, Finale; Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, Alegro con spirito.

NEW YORK
EVE. SUN

NOV 23 1928

mphony Opens Season

usigate,' Stravinsky's Latest in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

phony Orchestra came to town yesterday t of the season in Carnegie Hall last eve- m began with the latest effulgence of the sky, a ballet named "Apollon Musagete" llo, Leader of the Muses."

This composition was produced in Paris in June of the present year, but had its first hearing at Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge's festival of chamber music in the Library of Congress April 27. Adolf Bolm was the principal male mime and Ruth Page the leading female dancer and pantomimist.

Official information is that no story is narrated by this work, which is merely a series of "divertissements" treating of the birth of the god and his inspiration of the muses. When it was performed in Paris the dancing was founded on the classic school with some original additions and variations, but without any of the grotesqueries common in recent years. Stravinsky's ballet was not mimed on the decorous stage of Carnegie Hall last evening. Those of the listeners who possessed imaginations not atrophied by contemporaneous urban life and were willing to give them free play may have constructed their own choreography. As for the music it was obliged to stand upon its own feet, unaided by those of terpsichorean explicators.

The form of the composition is that of theme and variations. The fundamental idea represents the advent of Apollo. Each variation depicts an experience with one of the muses and the finale the leadership of the god. All of which would matter little if the composer did not furnish music good merely as music without reference to persons, places and things. The title indicates a desire to create a classic atmosphere and this Stravinsky has done with signal success. The employment of strings unassisted affords a delightful clarity and serenity; and the recent return of the eminent Russian master to earlier ideals of musical beauty than those worshiped in "Le Sacre du Printemps" gives us tonalities which would have found favor among the fathers. There is nothing harsh, nothing eccentric, nothing bizarre. The music is chaste, dignified, restful, and it is genuinely beautiful. [illegible]wn. [illegible]of [illegible]nce [illegible]mic [illegible]tely [illegible]ate [illegible]ta- [illegible]an [illegible]of [illegible]as [illegible]to [illegible]s

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

NOV 23 1928

Boston Players Present 'Apollo,' By Stravinsky

Danceless Neo-Classic by the King of Ultra-Moderns Is New Conductor's Feature

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in its forty-eighth season and its fifth under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, gave its first New York concert of 1928-'29 last night in Carnegie Hall, and gave to New York its first opportunity to hear the music of Stravinsky's recent ballet, "Apollo Musagetes," or, in the Gallicized form used on yesterday's program, "Apollon Musagete."

The ballet was first performed in Washington last April in Mrs. F. S. Coolidge's Library of Congress festival, for which it was commissioned, with Adolph Bolm heading the dancers. It crossed the Atlantic to be produced by the Diaghileff ballet in Paris and London last June, and the music, while not the choreography, recrossed the ocean to be introduced to Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky last month as a concert piece. The work takes twenty minutes in performance; its form is that of a theme and variations; its style is distinctly conservative.

Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," which was introduced to us last season, gave reason to revise the belief that the Russian's day was closing, but "Apollo Musagetes," coming after it, was disappointing, not that it shows Stravinsky in one of his turns towards neoclassism, but because it is not particularly significant or interesting music. It is tuneful, without doubt, and amiable, but with little variety of color, little potency—polite entertainment, and not very entertaining at that.

The audience received these unusually sweet Stravinskian strains most cordially. Mr. Koussevitzky then conducted Schumann's B flat symphony, No. 1, known as the "Spring" symphony, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase," a work which he and the Boston players almost succeed in endowing with a resemblance to truly great music.

Schumann's B flat symphony. Its maker intended at one time to call it the "Spring" symphony and it is generally known by that name. It glows and throbs with the rising blood of the vernal season. Assuredly Mr. Koussevitzky felt that it did. There has not been such a full throated delivery of this passionate instrumental song in years. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether the composition was ever read with more intensity, more thrill, more palpitating spirit. The orchestra gave a performance which was superlatively fine in opulence of tone and finish of style. The old work rose to new life. When it is played as it was last evening, it puts on the shining garb of immortality.

The last number on the list was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" which was produced here years ago by the Russian Symphony Society, what time the industrious Modest Altschuler was acquainting us with numerous elegant trifles from the then aristocratic seclusion of Petrograd. Scriabin's music generally lost itself in the clouds of philosophy or mysticism and was entangled in the meshes of strange tonalities or wildernesses where tonality was absent. However, there are still music lovers who can find precious messages in the works of this composer and this commentator is wholly willing to leave them undisturbed in their Buddhistic devotion.

NEW YORK WORLD

NOV 23 1928

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The Bostonians

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P.M.

Ballet, "Apollo Musagetes".....Stravinsky
First time in New York.
Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1..Schumann
"Le Poeme de l'Extrase".....Scriabine

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local series took place at Carnegie Hall last night with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The Russian leader, still at this date burning for the modernists and for Stravinsky in particular—Stravinsky I suppose would now be repudiated by any honest-to-God modernist—opened his program with the "Apollon Musagete" ballet, first heard and seen in America at Mrs. Coolidge's music festival in the Library of Congress last April.

The Boston orchestra's version was, of course, minus the ballet. Ordinarily the music of a ballet, without the connivance of the stage spectacle, suffers through the absence of the program upon which the composer had built his score. But having heard the "Apollon" at its Washington premiere I found Mr. Koussevitzky's purely musical presentation more effective. I hasten to add, however, that this was solely due to the Boston Symphony's expert performance, for the music seemed unimportant stuff both in New York last night and in Washington last April.

Like the crow in the fable who drops the substantial morsel from its mouth through its desire to deserve the hypocritical encomiums the fox had heaped on its voice, Stravinsky has long ago forfeited his small but substantial talent, as exemplified in "Petrouchka," for the experiments and theories with which present day composers seek to hide their lack of musical inspiration. The latest Stravinsky pose is the Greek. But scratch the helmet of Apollo and the draperies of his attendant muses and you will no longer find even a Tartar. Rather will you find a bewildered Franco-Russian trying desperately to keep the secret of his musical impotence from a still adoring world.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a splendid reading of the Schumann "Spring" symphony, one in which rhythmical vitality predominated, but not to the exclusion of the music's deeply poetic quality. I wonder whether any one has ever noticed the similarity of the secondary theme in the last movement of the symphony to a canzonetta in G minor in one of Mendelssohn's string quartets?

The concert ended with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." When it comes to Scriabin Mr. Koussevitzky need fear no rival.

NEW YORK
EVE. POST

NOV 23 1928

214

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Introduced to New York at Boston Symphony's First Concert

HOW differently the same music may sound when listened to under altered circumstances was brought home to some, at least, of those who heard in Carnegie Hall last night, at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, the "Apollon Musagetes" ballet of Stravinsky, which had its initial presentation anywhere in the Library of Congress last April. Written under commission from Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for her festival in Washington, the work was there given in choreographic form, as it since has been given in Paris and London. Last night there were no dancers, no visual action, but, instead, the nobly sonorous strings of the Boston Symphony and the exceedingly sensitive and vital leadership of Serge Koussevitzky to concentrate attention on the score. The performance was one to disclose all this music may possess of aristocratic workmanship and perhaps to seem to invest it with qualities more truly those of the ensemble than of the pages that ensemble brought to life. Like the other Stravinsky ballets, this one fared much better, musically, out of the theatre than in it. At Washington, though the skill with which it was written was apparent, it sounded thin and artificially simple, a pale reversion to an age utterly alien to the man who wrote "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." Last night, poor as much of the material still seemed, it boasted of such richness and delicacy of string sonorities as could only be contemplated with ungrudged admiration. Perhaps this was due chiefly to the playing of Mr. Koussevitzky's band. But Igor Stravinsky provided them with the substance it was their lot to play. This reviewer, if no less disposed than before to view the Stravinsky score as largely experimental and as representing a step backward or sideways, rather than forward, in the curious career of this perpetually restless Slav, was very glad to have heard again a score that at first listening gave little prospect of improving with increased familiarity.

THOUGH Adolph Bolm, at Washington, and George Balanchin of the Diaghileffs, in Paris, provided choreographic action that told some semblance of a story, no explicit or even tangible explanation of Stravinsky's aims in reverting to the straightforward stage ballet of the last century and its immediate predecessor has come this way. Philip Hale in his program notes mentions that this ballet has been said to have had "two ancestral homes, Parnassus and Versailles." There is perhaps more of Versailles than of Parnassus in the quality of the inspiration, as in the expertness of the writing. At its best, it is exquisite in its manner of saying things that in other language would not of themselves seem exquisite or even worth the saying. It turns back to the music of the past, but not to the giants of that past.

If the spirits of an older day are invoked in this music, they are the lesser spirits. They are the men whose music has died, though it had a sweetness in its day—as this music of Stravinsky's would seem destined to die, if it is not, by reason of its anachronistic style and its feeble invention, still-born, irrespective of superb craftsmanship. How much of the very hearty applause last night was for the work and how much for the orchestra is beyond surmise. The protracted demonstration for the conductor when he first appeared on the platform indicated a pardonable readiness to be pleased. Thereafter, the orchestra played with a beauty of tone and a perfection of ensemble that could scarcely have failed to win over the most reluctant.

THE Schumann B flat Symphony sang its song of spring vigorously and full-bloodedly and with relatively little of the sharper accentuation and the vagaries of pace that have given Koussevitzky readings of romantic works a note of variance from traditionalized Germanic performances. However, Scriabin, not Schumann, is a Koussevitzky specialty. "The Poem of Ecstasy" scared, swooned, stormed and swooned again, as it has done these things for Koussevitzky at other concerts, by way of a finale to test the neural responsiveness of any audience and the acoustical stability of any hall.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD

NOV 23 1928

MUSIC

By Richard[illegible]

FOR the first time this season [illegible]ymphony Orchestra returned yesterday evening to Carne[illegible] was welcomed by a throng of rejoicing admirers which [illegible]uditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky, who had previously revisited the gl[illegible]his clime in the role of a solo contrabassist, was saluted with pro[illegible]lamations when he appeared on the platform.

After the first few measures, it was [illegible]e in every lineament musicians obvious that the Boston organization [illegible]of birth. It is impossible to is still the premier orchestra of Je[illegible] Schumann or Scriabin in season—robust and polished, mun[illegible]en profession. But Stravinsky cent and yet refined. The progr[illegible]s me as a general talent, acciwas first heard at the Library of Congress in Washington on April 27 last, and which enjoyed last night its initial production in this city. It was followed by Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat Major, and Alexander Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54.

began with Igor Stravinsky's ballet [illegible]rected to music. He would string band, "Apollon Musagete[illegible]s plausible as a physician, ("Apollo Leader of the Muses"), whic[illegible]manager of a corporation. [illegible]taneously musical ideas of first symphony were par[illegible]lectable in contrast, and [illegible] to overlook the diffuse[illegible]scourse and the frequent [illegible]s instrumentation. "The [illegible]tasy" received a perform[illegible] of its resplendent title—[illegible]minated with passion and with as blinding a glare of as is possible to the modern

* * *

The ballet consists of two scenes. The first depicts the birth of Apollo, and the second is a set of variations celebrating his government of the Muses, among whom only Polymnia and Terpischore achieve individual mention. There is a concluding apotheosis.

Some natural doubts as to how Stravinsky, specialist in percussion, would prosper with the string orchestra were dissipated quickly. The form is handled with masterly science, with a singular richness, power and color, and a tone balanced and transparent. The purpose appeared to be that of conjuring up a seventeenth century atmosphere without abandoning the modern idiom. This involved an attempt to write candid melody of an old-fashioned sort.

* * *

That the mood was firmly recaptured and held with dignity and continence will scarcely be denied. But for me the composition was riddled by the prosaic and unimaginative character of the airs. The other composers on the pro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD

NOV 23 1928

Ottorino Respighi, composer of "La Campana Sommersa," and Mrs. Fritz Reiner, wife of the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, attended the Boston Orchestra's concert.

CITIZEN
BROOKLYN

BEAUTIFUL WED
HELD FOR M AND JAM

duct . The marriage of Miss Mar
Aca and Mrs. Charles J. O'Brien, ing, Brown, Jr., of Sterling stree
Ove romeo Roman Catholic Churc
l'Ap The ceremony was performed by th
25, Rev. Joseph A. Schreiner at a nupti
Bee mass, which was said by Rev. Ambro

Serge Koussevitzky. Since it began last October, in Boston, new and notable achievements have pointed to one of the most brilliant seasons in the history of this illustrious orchestra. The opening New York concerts will take place next Thursday and Saturday.

Those season tickets which have not been re-engaged will be placed on sale at Steinerts, a week from Monday. Meanwhile inquiries may be addressed to Symphony hall, Boston. The number of seats released last spring were few indeed, and a full subscription is probable.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 2 1 1928

Boston Symphony

Frank A. Sedgwick is offering to reserve tickets for his patrons, which will be held until the 20th of January. Just phone 2-2251 and secure good locations at this time.

Quoting from The Courant review of last year's concert, Walter Brown wrote:

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky played magnificently at the Capitol Theater yesterday and music lovers who failed to attend missed one of the greatest of musical events; for the coming of a great orchestra is an outstanding event in the musical history of any city, and Hartford has all too few orchestral concerts.

"The orchestra was in fine form and Mr. Koussevitzky again showed not only his grace and charm of direction but his splendid sense of values and his eloquent uses of contrasts in his readings. The audience was of large size and extraordinarily enthusiastic and at the conclusion of the concert the conductor was called again and again to the stage, the members of the orchestra rising to receive the applause with him.

"Mr. Sedgwick is to be thanked for bringing the Boston orchestra here for the concert."

Tickets are on sale at McCoy's Inc., 89 Asylum Street.

New York Telegraph

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will introduce [illegible] New York, at the opening Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Carnegie Hall tomorrow evening, Stravinsky's recent score, "Apollon Musagete" ("Apollo, Leader of the Muses"). Koussevitzky has been the first to bring the music of this ballet into the concert hall, for he played it at symphony concerts in Boston last month. The ballet was first produced at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress, Washington, last April. Diaghileff's Ballet Russe staged it in Paris and in London last June. The entire orchestration is for strings. It is in the musical variation form. The theme, as first stated, represents the Birth of Apollo, and the ensuing variations are the god's encounters with the three muses — Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. The style is of classical simplicity.

Further, the program includes Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstacy" and Schumann's Symphony in B flat major. During the Saturday matinee, the Boston Symphony will play "Classical Symphony" of Prokofieff, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROV
PROGRAM ANNOUNCED JOURNAL

Beethoven, Debussy and Prokofieff will occupy the first part and a Brahms symphony the last part of the concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, will offer for its inaugural program here this season on Dec. 4. The order is announced as follows: NOV 23

Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72, Beethoven; "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune" (Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun), eclogue by S. Mallarme, Debussy; "Classical," Symphony, opus 25, Prokofieff, Allegro, Larghetto, Gavotte, Finale; Symphony No. 2 in D major, opus 73, Brahms, Allegro non troppo, Adagio non troppo, Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino, Alegro con spirito.

NEW YORK
EVE. SUN
NOV 2 3 1928

Boston Symphony Opens Season

'Apollon Musigate,' Stravinsky's Latest Work, Given in Program at Carnegie Hall.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to town yesterday for its first concert of the season in Carnegie Hall last evening. The program began with the latest effulgence of the genius of Stravinsky, a ballet named "Apollon Musagete" which means "Apollo, Leader of the Muses."

This composition was produced in Paris in June of the present year, but had its first hearing at Elizabeth Shurtlen Coolidge's festival of chamber music in the Library of Congress April 27. Adolf Bolm was the principal male mime and Ruth Page the leading female dancer and pantomimist.

Official information is that no story is narrated by this work, which is merely a series of "divertissements" treating of the birth of the god and his inspiration of the muses. When it was performed in Paris the dancing was founded on the classic school with some original additions and variations, but without any of the grotesqueries common in recent years. Stravinsky's ballet was not mimed on the decorous stage of Carnegie Hall last evening. Those of the listeners who possessed imaginations not atrophied by contemporaneous urban life and were willing to give them free play may have constructed their own choreography. As for the music it was obliged to stand upon its own feet, unaided by those of terpsichorean explicators.

The form of the composition is that of theme and variations. The fundamental idea represents the advent of Apollo. Each variation depicts an experience with one of the muses and the finale the leadership of the god. All of which would matter little if the composer did not furnish music good merely as music without reference to persons, places and things. The title indicates a desire to create a classic atmosphere and this Stravinsky has done with signal success. The employment of strings unassisted affords a delightful clarity and serenity; and the recent return of the eminent Russian master to earlier ideals of musical beauty than those worshiped in "Le Sacre du Printemps" gives us tonalities which would have found favor among the fathers. There is nothing harsh, nothing eccentric, nothing bizarre. The music is chaste, dignified, restful, and it is genuinely beautiful. Furthermore, it is Stravinsky's own. His classic fields are not those of Gluck, yet they have the fragrance of Greece and suggest the academic grove. This ballet suite seems likely to outlive several of its immediate predecessors in the Stravinsky catalogue, works in which the musician was apparently not quite certain of his path or his destination. He has come happily out of the woods into the sunlight of a better day.

Following the ballet suite was Schumann's B flat symphony. Its maker intended at one time to call it the "Spring" symphony and it is generally known by that name. It glows and throbs with the rising blood of the vernal season. Assuredly Mr. Koussevitzky felt that it did. There has not been such a full throated delivery of this passionate instrumental song in years. Indeed, it may well be doubted whether the composition was ever read with more intensity, more thrill, more palpitating spirit. The orchestra gave a performance which was superlatively fine in opulence of tone and finish of style. The old work rose to new life. When it is played as it was last evening, it puts on the shining garb of immortality.

The last number on the list was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" which was produced here years ago by the Russian Symphony Society, what time the industrious Modest Altschuler was acquainting us with numerous elegant trifles from the then aristocratic seclusion of Petrograd. Scriabin's music generally lost itself in the clouds of philosophy or mysticism and was entangled in the meshes of strange tonalities or wildernesses where tonality was absent. However, there are still music lovers who can find precious messages in the works of this composer and this commentator is wholly willing to leave them undisturbed in their Buddhistic devotion.

Washington last April in [illegible] S. Coolidge's Library of Congress festival, for which it was commissioned, with Adolph Bolm heading the dancers. It crossed the Atlantic to be produced by the Diaghileff ballet in Paris and London last June, and the music, while not the choreography, recrossed the ocean to be introduced to Boston by Mr. Koussevitzky last month as a concert piece. The work takes twenty minutes in performance; its form is that of a theme and variations; its style is distinctly conservative.

Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," which was introduced to us last season, gave reason to revise the belief that the Russian's day was closing, but "Apollo Musagetes," coming after it, was disappointing, not that it shows Stravinsky in one of his turns towards neoclassism, but because it is not particularly significant or interesting music. It is tuneful, without doubt, and amiable, but with little variety of color, little potency—polite entertainment, and not very entertaining at that.

The audience received these unusually sweet Stravinskian strains most cordially. Mr. Koussevitzky then conducted Schumann's B flat symphony, No. 1, known as the "Spring" symphony, and Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase," a work which he and the Boston players almost succeed in endowing with a resemblance to truly great music.

NEW YORK WORLD
NOV 2 3 1928

MUSIC

By Samuel Chotzinoff

The Bostonians

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Carnegie Hall, 8.30 P. M.
Ballet, "Apollo Musagetes".....Stravinsky
First time in New York.
Symphony in B Flat Major, No. 1..Schumann
"Le Poeme de l'Extase".....Scriabine

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local series took place at Carnegie Hall last night with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting. The Russian leader, still at this date burning for the modernists and for Stravinsky in particular—Stravinsky I suppose would now be repudiated by any honest-to-God modernist—opened his program with the "Apollon Musagete" ballet, first heard and seen in America at Mrs. Coolidge's music festival in the Library of Congress last April.

The Boston orchestra's version was, of course, minus the ballet. Ordinarily the music of a ballet, without the connivance of the stage spectacle, suffers through the absence of the program upon which the composer had built his score. But having heard the "Apollon" at its Washington premiere I found Mr. Koussevitzky's purely musical presentation more effective. I hasten to add, however, that this was solely due to the Boston Symphony's expert performance, for the music seemed unimportant stuff both in New York last night and in Washington last April.

Like the crow in the fable who drops the substantial morsel from its mouth through its desire to deserve the hypocritical encomiums the fox had heaped on its voice, Stravinsky has long ago forfeited his small but substantial talent, as exemplified in "Petrouchka," for the experiments and theories with which present day composers seek to hide their lack of musical inspiration. The latest Stravinsky pose is the Greek. But scratch the helmet of Apollo and the draperies of his attendant muses and you will no longer find even a Tartar. Rather will you find a bewildered Franco-Russian trying desperately to keep the secret of his musical impotence from a still adoring world.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave a splendid reading of the Schumann "Spring" symphony, one in which rhythmical vitality predominated, but not to the exclusion of the music's deeply poetic quality. I wonder whether any one has ever noticed the similarity of the secondary theme in the last movement of the symphony to a canzonetta in G minor in one of Mendelssohn's string quartets?

The concert ended with Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." When it comes to Scriabin Mr. Koussevitzky need fear no rival.

NEW YORK
EVE. POST
NOV 2 3 1928

214

Music : By Oscar Thompson

Stravinsky's "Apollon Musagete" Introduced to New York at Boston Symphony's First Concert

HOW differently the same music may sound when listened to under altered circumstances was brought home to some, at least, of those who heard in Carnegie Hall last night, at the first of the Boston Symphony concerts of the season, the "Apollon Musagetes" ballet of Stravinsky, which had its initial presentation anywhere in the Library of Congress last April. Written under commission from Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge for her festival in Washington, the work was there given in choreographic form, as it since has been given in Paris and London. Last night there were no dancers, no visual action, but, instead, the nobly sonorous strings of the Boston Symphony and the exceedingly sensitive and vital leadership of Serge Koussevitzky to concentrate attention on the score. The performance was one to disclose all this music may possess of aristocratic workmanship and perhaps to seem to invest it with qualities more truly those of the ensemble than of the pages that ensemble brought to life. Like the other Stravinsky ballets, this one fared much better, musically, out of the theatre than in it. At Washington, though the skill with which it was written was apparent, it sounded thin and artificially simple, a pale reversion to an age utterly alien to the man who wrote "Petrushka" and "Le Sacre." Last night, poor as much of the material still seemed, it boasted of such richness and delicacy of string sonorities as could only be contemplated with ungrudged admiration. Perhaps this was due chiefly to the playing of Mr. Koussevitzky's band. But Igor Stravinsky provided them with the substance it was their lot to play. This reviewer, if no less disposed than before to view the Stravinsky score as largely experimental and as representing a step backward or sideways, rather than forward, in the curious career of this perpetually restless Slav, was very glad to have heard again a score that at first listening gave little prospect of improving with increased familiarity.

THOUGH Adolph Bolm, at Washington, and George Balanchin of the Diaghileffs, in Paris, provided choreographic action that told some semblance of a story, no explicit or even tangible explanation of Stravinsky's aims in reverting to the straightforward stage ballet of the last century and its immediate predecessor has come this way. Philip Hale in his program notes mentions that this ballet has been said to have had "two ancestral homes, Parnassus and Versailles." There is perhaps more of Versailles than of Parnassus in the quality of the inspiration, as in the expertness of the writing. At its best, it is exquisite in its manner of saying things that in other language would not of themselves seem exquisite or even worth the saying. It turns back to the music of the past, but not to the giants of that past.

If the spirits of an older day are invoked in this music, they are the lesser spirits. They are the men whose music has died, though it had a sweetness in its day—as this music of Stravinsky's would seem destined to die, if it is not, by reason of its anachronistic style and its feeble invention, still-born, irrespective of superb craftsmanship. How much of the very hearty applause last night was for the work and how much for the orchestra is beyond surmise. The protracted demonstration for the conductor when he first appeared on the platform indicated a pardonable readiness to be pleased. Thereafter, the orchestra played with a beauty of tone and a perfection of ensemble that could scarcely have failed to win over the most reluctant.

THE Schumann B flat Symphony sang its song of spring vigorously and full-bloodedly and with relatively little of the sharper accentuation and the vagaries of pace that have given Koussevitzky readings of romantic works a note of variance from traditionalized Germanic performances. However, Scriabin, not Schumann, is a Koussevitzky specialty. "The Poem of Ecstasy" scared, swooned, stormed and swooned again, as it has done these things for Koussevitzky at other concerts, by way of a finale to test the neural responsiveness of any audience and the acoustical stability of any hall.

NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
NOV 2 3 1928

MU[illegible]C

By Richa[illegible]

FOR the first time this season [illegible] yesterday evening to Carn[illegible] of rejoicing admirers which [illegible] who had previously revisited the gl[illegible] contrabassist, was saluted with pro[illegible] on the platform.

After the first few measures, it wa[illegible] obvious that the Boston organizatio[illegible] is still the premier orchestra of le[illegible] season—robust and polished, munif[illegible] cent and yet refined. The progra[illegible] began with Igor Stravinsky's ballet fo[illegible] string band, "Apollon Musagete ("Apollo Leader of the Muses"), whic[illegible] was first heard at the Library of Congress in Washington on April 27 last, and which enjoyed last night its initial production in this city. It was followed by Schumann's "Spring" Symphony, No. 1, in B-flat Major, and Alexander Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase," Op. 54.

* * *

The ballet consists of two scenes. The first depicts the birth of Apollo, and the second is a set of variations celebrating his government of the Muses, among whom only Polymnia and Terpischore achieve individual mention. There is a concluding apotheosis.

Some natural doubts as to how Stravinsky, specialist in percussion, would prosper with the string orchestra were dissipated quickly. The form is handled with masterly science, with a singular richness, power and color, and a tone balanced and transparent. The purpose appeared to be that of conjuring up a seventeenth century atmosphere without abandoning the modern idiom. This involved an attempt to write candid melody of an old-fashioned sort.

* * *

That the mood was firmly recaptured and held with dignity and continence will scarcely be denied. But for me the composition was riddled by the prosaic and unimaginative character of the airs. The other composers on the pro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING WORLD
NOV 2 3 1928

Ottorino Respighi, composer of "La Campana Sommersa," and Mrs. Fritz Reiner, wife of the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, attended the Boston Orchestra's concert.

[illegible]C
[illegible]kes
[illegible]ymphony Orchestra returned [illegible] was welcomed by a throng [illegible]ditorium. Mr. Koussevitzky, [illegible]s clime in the role of a solo [illegible]amations when he appeared

[illegible]re in every lineament musicians [illegible] of birth. It is impossible to [illegible] of Schumann or Scriabin in [illegible]n profession. But Stravinsky [illegible]s one as a general talent, acci[illegible]irected to music. He would [illegible]s plausible as a physician, [illegible] manager of a corporation. [illegible]taneously musical ideas of [illegible] first symphony were par[illegible]lectable in contrast, and [illegible] to overlook the diffuse[illegible]scourse and the frequent [illegible]s instrumentation. "The [illegible]tasy" received a perform[illegible] of its resplendent title—[illegible]minated with passion and [illegible]with as blinding a glare of [illegible]s is possible to the modern

215

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAM

NOV 2 3 1928

STRAVINSKY TO THE MUSES

The Boston Symphony reached Carnegie Hall yesterday evening and proceeded forthwith to invoke Parnassus and Versailles. Which, being translated, means that the gracious visitors gave the first New York performance of Igor Stravinsky's "Apollo Musagetes," a work that, according to Philip Hale, has its ancestral home in both of these delectable localities. Some folks with long memories may recall that its world premiere took place at Mrs. E. C. Coolidge's chamber music festival in Washington last April. For the holy sake of statistics it should be added in this place that it was brought forward in Paris and in London by the Diaghilew Ballet last June.

For "Apollo Musagetes" ("Musagetes" being, as they say in "Iolanthe," a "Greek remark" and signifying leader of the muses"), was designed as a ballet and as such it was performed even in the sober precincts of the Congressional Library. Its characters, besides the radiant god, are Polymnia, Calliope and Terpsichore, from the ranks of the ineffable Nine. Last night it was given, of course without its choreographic accessories.

In some respects the presence of these might have helped to elucidate certain essentials of the music. But even in the absence of the dance and its trappings, this music, which came in for some round denunciation at Washington last spring, impressed one listener yesterday as by far the finest thing Stravinsky has put forth since he started to revert to the ancients.

There are two scenes without fixed story in the ballet. The first is designated as the "Birth of Apollo"; the second in a series of variations, furnishes the dances of the god and of the respective muses and terminates in a co[illegible] and apotheosis. The instrumentation is exclusively one of strings. For plangency, richness, superb workmanship and magnificent sonority nothing has been written of late years to surpass this scoring and little to equal it, especially when, as last night, it mounts and soars in the full-toned splendor of the Boston Symphony strings.

The work is not easily classified or described. It has dignity and distinction of style and facture. There are curious discrepancies between the thematic materials and their settings and treatment. Often these materials seem slight and sometimes they pause on the threshold of actual reminiscence (one motive even sounds like a fleet variant of Dvorak's "Humoresque").

Those sterile polytonal experiments which have defaced recent Stravinskyian scores have no part in this latest creation. On the other hand, this music is infused with a strong sense of period. If it aspires to an evocation of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, to the spirit and the atmosphere of their danced diversions, it achieves them. Mr. Hale's phrase about Parnassus and Versailles is more a subtle interpretation than a witticism.

After the superlative playing of this work Serge Koussevitzky and his men gave a vigorous and jubilant performance of Schumann's "Spring" Symphony. The concert was brought to an end with Scriabine's Poem of Ecstasy." H. F. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JOURNAL

NOV 2 3 1928

Boston Orchestra Plays New Work by Stravinsky

By IRVING WEIL.

For his first concert of the season in New York, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Orchestra, disclosed to his Carnegie Hall audience last night some new music by Igor Stravinsky. This was "Apollon Musagetes," Englished as "Apollo, Leander of the Muses." It was written as a ballet but at the same time was deliberately intended to be just as effective when played as a concert piece. Although this was its first performance here, it had already been heard in Washington last Spring and last Summer in Paris and London.

Anything new by Stravinsky is not only certain of arousing extraordinary expectations, but until quite recently it has always made the more conservative—and largest—part of any audience await what was coming with the fascinated dread of the rabbit fixed by the glittering eye of the cobra. But since this most arresting of contemporary composers gave up writing in a style of barbaric rhythm and polytonal dissonance and began experimenting with classic form and expression, he has come to be regarded with less foreboding—as a nonconformist black sheep miraculously made white and slipping back into the ancient fold.

For our own part, we believe the neo-classic Stravinsky to be merely schooling himself in the science and the material that will provide him eventually with the basis for a startling new expression of himself in his own essential and characteristic idiom. In the meantime, he has experimented with a piano concerto that seemed to be an exercise in the exhaustive counterpoint of Bach; with the oratorio, "Oedipus Rex," an exploration of Handelian potentialities, and now with this classic ballet of "Apollo," seemingly a strict and utterly self-contained product in the spirit of Gluck and the form of Haydn and Mozart.

It will thus be observed that Stravinsky is now engrossed with the eighteenth century; but he is not immersed in it, for all of this music is sufficiently different from that of the periods of Bach and Handel, Gluck and Haydn and Mozart to have opened their eyes wide with amazement.

"Apollo," is a beautiful, simple and immensely skillful example of the theme-and-variation form written only for the string band. But anyone happening into Carnegie Hall last night, without knowing what was going forward, would never in the world have guessed, by listening to it, that Stravinsky was the author of it. A hint here and there in the harmonic structure showed the cloven hoof of the man who wrote "The Consecration of Spring"; but that was all.

The principal impression, one got from the music, was one of melody. Last night's audience, therefore, accepted it with enthusiasm. Some of its applause was doubtless meant for the extraordinarily fine performance, for Mr. Koussevitzky played the piece with a vivid sense of its necessities and the Bostonians' strings glowed with the warmth of tone they put into it.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American

NOV 2 3 1928

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NOVELTY BY SERGE STRAVINSKY

By LEONARD LIEBLING.

LAST evening the excellent Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by the gifted Serge Koussevitzky, came to Carnegie Hall for one of its serial visits here.

The occasion had its customary high artistic merits, but also offered an element of novelty in the form of a "first time in New York" of a recent work from the pen of the redoubtable Igor Stravinsky.

"Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses) is the latest flowering of the Stravinsky talent, which has of late seemingly renounced its earlier revolutionary tendencies. The opus heard last night is a concert arrangement of the score of a ballet which had its premiere last April at the Coolidge (Elizabeth, not Calvin) Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress at Washington. Paris and London produced the piece in June. Boston had the initial performance of the concert version October 12.

This Stravinsky music is for stringed instruments only and is written in the form of variations. The chief theme represents the birth of Apollo and the derived variations depict that god's meetings with the trio of muses, Polymnia, Terpsichore and Calliope. There does not seem to be much "story" ballet, or at least Mr. Hale's programme-notes of last evening gave out none.

Stravinsky Tamed

In his "Apollon" we encounter a tamed and almost timid Stravinsky. If he has not gone "Back to Melody" (as Governor Smith has it in his feeling Schubert Week proclamation) he has reached even more remotely and gone "back to Bach." The "Apollon" is definitely Bachian and the style fits the subject of the piece.

Stravinsky wears the classical mantle well. He eschews the tonal flesh-pots and makes spiritual confessions. Simplicity, loftiness and transparent counterpoint distinguish the "Apollon" pages. It is pure music, with an exquisite finale of poetical beauty.

Stravinsky's modernistic disguise now stripped off, he stands revealed as a scholarly and serious musician. Or is that only another of his many masquerades?

Delightful was the playing of Schumann's sunshiny B flat symphony, of which Koussevitzky's reading emphasized all the lyric loveliness and unashamed romanticism. It was a matchless piece of orchestral performance, too, on the part of the instrumentalists.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" ended the concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE

NOV 2 3 1928

Music of the Day

By EDWARD CUSHING

"Apollo Musagetes," a Ballet by Igor Strawinsky, Is Played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra "Romeo et Juliette" at the Opera House.

IT WAS only a little more than six months ago that an audience of celebrities gathered in the Music Hall of the Library of Congress to attend the first performance anywhere of a ballet by Igor Strawinsky, "Apollo Musagetes" (or, as Mr. Koussewitsky prefers, "Apollon Musagete"). Very probably the first Strawinsky premiere to occur on the continent west of the Atlantic, it had been made possible by the munificence of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge. The most original of American patronesses of music, it was she who invited Strawinsky to compose "Apollo" for the Congressional Library and for the concerts of chamber music given there annually as a result of her generosity. Completed at Nice in January of 1928, the ballet was therefore performed in Washington on the 29th of April of—quite naturally!—the same year. Adolph Bolm, Bernice Holmes, Ruth Page and Elise Reiman danced, the orchestra consisted of string players from the Philadelphia band under the baton of Hans Kindler, and the scenery for the production had been designed and painted by Nicholas Remisoff. Two months later, "Apollo Musagetes" was produced in Paris by M. Diaghilew's troupe, and those who could paid 150 francs to attend the performance in the Theater Sarah Bernhardt. London saw and heard the new ballet, under the same auspices, a few days later.

* * *

The first New York performance took place last evening, during a program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussewitsky conducting, in Carnegie Hall. It was a concert presentation, and the audience was obliged to imagine the masque for which Strawinsky designed his music—the birth of Apollo at the foot of Mount Cynthus, his reception by goddesses who offer him the nectar and ambrosia of the immortals, his concourse with the muses Calliope, Polymnia and Terpsichore, the latter of whom (as was inevitable in a ballet) wins his first favors. But the lack of visible action, of scenery and special effects is undoubtedly less detrimental to the effect of "Apollo" than it is to other of Strawinsky's theatrical works. We must not forget that the music of his later ballets and operas is intended to make an independant appeal to the senses of its auditors, and to derive no support from a text or a scenario to which it may be attached.

* * *

Perhaps it made last evening an efficacious appeal, for rather generous applause rewarded the performance under Mr. Koussowitsky's advantageous direction. But we prefer to attribute its success to the singularly lenient temper of the public, which accepts with equal favor the best and the worst of what is offered to it. It is a curious score, and perhaps we should say at once that it is a poor one, the most inconsequential that its composer has produced. Following "Oedipus Rex," the simplicity of its form and texture should occasion no surprise. Doubtless it represents a further development of Strawinsky's style toward the ideal of complete triviality which he seems to have been pursuing steadily since 1913. It pays homage to a dozen different composers—Wagner, Gluck Rossini, Johann Strauss, Delibes, among others—before it has run its course, but there is in it surprisingly little Strawinsky, much less, in deed, than in such frankly initiative works as "Pulcinella" and "Marva."

* * *

We are not tempted to discuss it now in greater detail. Fortunately, it was short, and before the intermission Mr. Koussewitsky had time to read the "Spring" Symphony of Schumann—a somewhat heavy, overemphatic performance, but brilliant, and revelatory of the virtuosity of the orchestra. The program concluded with Scriabin's "Poeme de l'estase."

* * *

At the Opera House Miss Queena Mario and Mr. Gigli shared the honors in the first performance this season of "Romeo et Juliette," assisted by a long cast that included Ellen Dalossy, Henriette Wakefield, Giuseppe De Luca, Adamo Didur and Leon Rothier. It was pleasant, after the false Gounod of pages of "Apollo Musagetes," to hear the voluptuous, heavily and somewhat inexpensively scented melodies of the duets in the fourth and fifth acts, and to hear them well sung by Miss Mario and Mr. Gigli. "Romeo et Juliette" is at least genuine in its cheapness, and genuineness is a quality which little of the music of today, whatever its pretensions, may claim to possess.

OTHER MUSIC.

Miss Inez Barbour, soprano, gave a recital yesterday afternoon at the Town Hall, consisting of songs of Handel, Bach, Brahms, Strauss and a modern French group, finishing up with four compositions of Henry Hadley, who in these accompanied his wife.

Miss Barbour was not altogether at her best in the Handel and Bach, while her singing of the Brahms songs was, to tell the truth, painful to hear. The "Asie," from the "Scheherazade" suite of Maurice Ravel, was very well done, the singer having obviously tramped on the trail of the great Croiza, with whose name this exquisite trio of songs is usually associated in Paris.

The remainder of the French group was adequately done and that is about all that can be said. Miss Barbour was assisted by John Amans, flutist, who provided the obligato for the Bach and Brahms songs. Richard Hageman at the piano gave his usual good account of himself, particularly in the very difficult Ravel accompaniment. E. B.

New York Telegraph

NOV 2 3 1928

SCRIABIN NUMBER BEST OFFERING AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Symphony Upholds Tradition With Thrilling Number as Program Ends.

By CHARLES D. ISAACSON.

It remained until a moment about three minutes from the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for something extraordinary to happen last night at Carnegie Hall.

Up to that time affairs had been hanging pretty much in the balance as to whether this opening concert of the Boston Orchestra season in New York was to be written down as a rather mild and tame affair or not.

Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are never carried in the stream of the musical tide in any city. They generally erect a milestone and an impression which is indelible. One expects to be shaken into a fervor, or swept into a torrent of tears. Dullness and mediocrity, uneventfulness and mere presentations are not the part of the Boston visits to the metropolis.

Record Endangered.

But until 10.14, or thereabouts (about an hour and fifty minutes from the time Mr. Koussevitsky lifted his baton), the age-old record seemed in danger of being shattered.

Then came the climax of the "Poem of Ecstacy" of Scriabin, and one had been furnished with sufficient inspiration to carry until the next visit of the Bostonians. That moment was approached by many suggestions and prophetic utterances of its imminent birth. It was preceded by a rush of gathering forces which were present at its delivery. And then—the ravishment.

It is not possible to put in words—such is the secret power of music and its supremacy over fixed expression—the sweep of that climax and the minutes which followed it, until the swooning death of the Poem.

The Russian composer, Scriabin, has given to the orchestra the apotheosis of ecstacy. He has painted the miraculous joys of humans in the height of their loves and joys, their successes and their far-visioned dreaming.

Herein the art of the musician touches the medium of expression where none other may approach its poignant and straight-reaching significance. Words, pictures, sculpture, dancing—all move about it. But music is the exposition of the mood, and the crystallization of the emotion.

Touches High Point.

I must pause, or I shall be writing a Poem of Ecstacy to the Scriabine Poem of Ecstacy.

This work was not intended to be outstanding offering of the opening Boston Symphony program. Rather attention was intended to be concentrated upon the first time performance in New York City of the Stravinsky Ballet "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses.)

Written first as a musical setting for the Diaghileff Ballet, it was given its world premiere in Washington, in April of this year, and was repeated at Paris in June and in London the same month.

In this work, the arch-modernist Stravinsky, settles back comfortably in his chair, and writes in the most formal and old-fashioned manner imaginable. Only one note in the entire Ballet which lasts about twenty minutes, suggested the Russian, and carries his harmonic signature.

The Ballet, which depicts the Birth of Apollo and is followed by divertissements representing Apollo with the Muses, the appearance of Polymnia and then of Terpsichore, is classical in spirit. Classical to Bach is one thing; classical to Stravinsky would be seemingly something entirely different. But Stravinsky fools the public this time. He begins with passages which are in the mood of Johann Sebastian Bach, especially in the violin solo passages.

Work Is Chaste.

Then he turns a bit to Mendelssohn, pays a tribute to Delibes, composer of "Coppelia," "Sylvia" and other ballets, and even suggests that tuneful Waldteufel of the waltz fame!

The work is calm, white, chaste, marble-figured and built in architecture of the Dorian mood.

It is a charming and melodic work and if it did not bear the name of Stravinsky it could have come out of the unknown writings of even Franz Schubert!

The other number on the program was the Schumann Symphony in B flat major, wherein Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to have given it too popular a treatment. He accentuated certain passages until they sounded like Riesenfeld-classic-jazz and made one expect any moment to see Roxyettes come tripping around the corner. As restrained and dignified as was Stravinsky, so modernized was Schumann. It did not sound at all authentic.

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 2 3 1928

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, was a triumph of an expert body of instrumentalists and a conductor of brilliant endowments and command of his men. As a sheerly musical occasion it was less impressive. The music, when it was of dubious value, was exalted by the prowess of the conductor. The work which had the most genuine music in it of anything on the program—Schumann's B flat symphony—was given a virtuoso interpretation which in some places robbed the music of its simple and unsophisticated charm. The audience, with reason, rejoiced in the character of the performances.

The first performance in New York of Stravinsky music for ballet "Apollon Musagete" was given. This ballet was given its first performance anywhere at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress last April 27. The music was played far better last night than in Washington; the score made no better impression on this writer than it did at the American première. Stravinsky writes for the nonce in the style of the classic French ballet, working occasional excursions into other manners and periods. He does this with exemplary skill, with transparent and expert scoring for the strings with the finished technic of a modern master. Saying which there is little more to be said.

The piece is plausible. It affords a polished and empty imitation of styles and models that it is fashionable to imitate in musical Paris of today, which Stravinsky, expatriated, makes his home, and where he is flattered and fêted. The emptiness and facility of the music soon become a weariness to the flesh. Why should it stop? Why not write a dozen more dance pieces that posture and prattle of nothing. Stravinsky, perhaps to amuse himself at the expense of the idolaters, to whom anything and everything he does is miracle and revelation, now cultivates more or less deliberately the musical platitudes of other times than this one, and calls the result a day's work and another commission filled.

Mr. Koussevitsky's performance of the Schumann symphony was in part one of rare eloquence and in part a virtuoso version of a familiar and beautiful piece of music. For this performance he strengthened his wind choir, but without harm to the proportions of the composition. He dared to take the slow movement at such a moderate pace that the ardent, long-breathed melody would have dropped apart in the hands of another conductor. But the melody was sung with a vernal warmth and languor which became it well.

If Mr. Koussevitzky had been less inclined to be [redacted] gratuitous prominence on insignificant details of the accompaniment the result would have been still more felicitous. His tempi in parts of the scherzo and of the finale were unconventional, and perhaps excessively fast. True, the pulse of this symphony does not beat as rapidly today as it did in the first half of the nineteenth century. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the music animation and he made Schumann's orchestra, which is sometimes thick, "sound." Perhaps it is too much to ask for more.

This writer would have welcomed less of the virtuoso element in certain pages and more of the adorable simplicity native to the Schumann of the "Spring" Symphony.

In the interpretation of Scriabine's curious, erootic and picturesquely flambouyant effusion—the "Poeme de l'Extase" conductor and orchestra excelled. The performance, as memory goes, was better because it was more spontaneous, coherent and cumulative in effect than a performance of the same piece that Mr. Koussevitzky gave seasons ago here. One wonders whether the secret of such interpretation will not die with Mr. Koussevitzky, at least with a chosen few of his colleagues who may reach his height of eloquence with the music—although we doubt this.

The reason for such a speculation is that probably no musician will take the "Poeme l'Extase" very seriously when fifty more years have passed; and if an interpreter cannot take a piece of music seriously he is likely to fail to make his audience do so. The "Poeme de L'Extase," which puzzled and shocked so many of us a few years ago, is now an affair of widening seams and patches. The mood, the keynote of the piece is passé. Scriabine discourses boudoir passion and parlor transcendalism. But he believes prodigiously in himself, and there is still a conductor to help him by at least pretending that he also believes.

Conductors of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers of evocation, however, are rare, and they will soon become rarer, so far as Scriabine is concerned. It was with a kind of reminiscent astonishment that one listened to this music last night, this strange and inverterbrate conglomeration, which, by virtue of nothing much more than a technic and a colossal megalomania on the part of its composer somehow contrives to achieve something, if it is only a loud, blasting, incoherent shout into the ether. The scoring, of course, in gorgeous.

When the climax, which is so long in coming, at last arrives, it is one of resounding splendor. And this was the aftermath of nineteenth century romanticism in Russia, and so fitful and dying are the flares from its ashes today. The "Poeme de l'Extase" remains for the present a capital vehicle for a virtuoso conductor—a battle-horse which Mr. Koussevitzky rode so magnificently last night that the audience was moved to applaud, and applaud, and applaud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzski's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpreters of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York city. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York this season.

Richard Aldrich, the music critic of the New York Times, writes of the second concert on November 29:

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal color, a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the 'muddiness' and 'grayness' that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought."

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

DEC 1 1928

Boston Programs.

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Lea Luboschutz, violinist, will be the assisting artist, playing a Prokofieff Concerto for violin and orchestra. The programs will include "La Symphonie," Martinu; Two Pieces for String Orchestra, by Copland, the young American composer, and the Pastorale Symphony of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME

DEC 24 1928

Notes

From Paris came roundabout word that Boston Symphony trustees have extended Conductor Serge Koussevitzky's contract indefinitely. The salary, it is said, "exceeds all expectations." Presumably it elevates Conductor Koussevitzky to a financial status comparable with that of Arturo Toscanini (New York Philharmonic Symphony) and Leopold Anton Stanislaw Stokowski (Philadelphia Orchestra).

216

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

DEC 1 1928

Boston Symphony

During the past month a number of recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky have been made by the Victor Talking Machine Company at Symphony Hall, Boston. Experts from the Victor plant installed recording apparatus in the famous auditorium so that the entire orchestra, playing exactly as it would at a public performance, was recorded and will be available to record buyers in the near future. The contract between the Victor Company and the Boston Symphony is of long duration so it is probable that many other recording sessions will be held in Symphony Hall in the future.

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzki's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Serge KoKussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpreters of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE

DEC 1 1928

Scrutiny of a List

WE HAVE been scanning the list of the three hundred and some-odd names of those persons who have subscribed as guarantors of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming year. The first fact that is discovered by such an examination is the distinct Americanism of the members. In fact, we doubt whether anywhere one could find a corresponding number of our citizens, associated in so artistic and altruistic a cause, among whom there would appear so few obviously foreign names.

We, of course ran down the roster, presented as it was in alphabetical order, to discover how fared the names of those almost sacrosanct families whose "conversational exclusiveness" has become a by-phrase of New England history—the Cabots and the Lowells. Running true to form, there were four Cabots on the list, that name having tied, for highest numerical honors, with the Holmes, Howes, Morses, Putnams, Richardsons and Jacksons. But of Lowells there was only one member present. There were found three Coolidges, three Curtises and three Sears.

Turning next from mere curiosity to what we might call the great staple names, we find just one Smith, one Brown, and not a single member of the extensive Jones family. There are some six or seven names, probably Jewish, or of Jewish origin, two beginning with "Mc.," that might be Scotch or Irish, but none of the many beginning with "O'," despite the usual assumption that Boston has an unusually large Hibernian population.

The other names on the roster are, in twos and singletons, an array of Ameses, Burrs, Days, Elerys, Fays, Fletchers, Frosts, Hayses, Hunnewells, Keys, Laphams, etc. There are a very few of German form or sound, but no Italian, Spanish or Slav name of easy determination. There was observed no Greek name, and less than half a dozen of French appearance, despite the very considerable Gallic population that has enfiltered into our "Down East" across from French Canada.

We customarily assume that the old line Americans of Anglo-Saxon stock are less musical than either the German or Latin races, and it is therefore more surprising to discover our foremost symphonic organization supported by descendants of the Puritans. This condition could not, we believe, have developed in any other section of our nation.

NOV 2 3 1928

...EST CONCERTS AT CARNEGIE HALL

Boston Symphony Upholds Tradition With Thrilling Number as Program Ends.

By CHARLES D. ISAACSON.

It remained until a moment about three minutes from the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for something extraordinary to happen last night at Carnegie Hall.

Up to that time affairs had been hanging pretty much in the balance as to whether this opening concert of the Boston Orchestra season in New York was to be written down as a rather mild and tame affair or not.

Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts are never carried in the stream of the musical tide in any city. They generally erect a milestone and an impression which is indelible. One expects to be shaken into a fervor, or swept into a torrent of tears. Dullness and mediocrity, uneventfulness and mere presentations are not the part of the Boston visits to the metropolis.

Record Endangered.

But until 10.14, or thereabouts (about an hour and fifty minutes from the time Mr. Koussevitsky lifted his baton), the age-old record seemed in danger of being shattered.

Then came the climax of the "Poem of Ecstacy" of Scriabin, and one had been furnished with sufficient inspiration to carry until the next visit of the Bostonians. That moment was approached by many suggestions and prophetic utterances of its imminent birth. It was preceded by a rush of gathering forces which were present at its delivery. And then—the ravishment.

It is not possible to put in words—such is the secret power of music and its supremacy over fixed expression—the sweep of that climax and the minutes which followed it, until the swooning death of the Poem.

The Russian composer, Scriabin, has given to the orchestra the apotheosis of ecstacy. He has painted the miraculous joys of humans in the height of their loves and joys, their successes and their far-visioned dreaming.

Herein the art of the musician touches the medium of expression where none other may approach its poignant and straight-reaching significance. Words, pictures, sculpture, dancing—all move about it. But music is the exposition of the mood, and the crystallization of the emotion.

Touches High Point.

I must pause, or I shall be writing a Poem of Ecstacy to the Scriabine Poem of Ecstacy.

This work was not intended to be outstanding offering of the opening Boston Symphony program. Rather attention was intended to be concentrated upon the first time performance in New York City of the Stravinsky Ballet "Apollon Musagete" (Apollo, Leader of the Muses.)

Written first as a musical setting for the Diaghileff Ballet, it was given its world premiere in Washington, in April of this year, and was repeated at Paris in June and in London the same month.

In this work, the arch-modernist Stravinsky, settles back comfortably in his chair, and writes in the most formal and old-fashioned manner imaginable. Only one note in the entire Ballet which lasts about twenty minutes, suggested the Russian, and carries his harmonic signature.

The Ballet, which depicts the Birth of Apollo and is followed by divertissements representing Apollo with the Muses, the appearance of Polymnia and then of Terpsichore, is classical in spirit. Classical to Bach is one thing; classical to Stravinsky would be seemingly something entirely different. But Stravinsky fools the public this time. He begins with passages which are in the mood of Johann Sebastian Bach, especially in the violin solo passages.

Work Is Chaste.

Then he turns a bit to Mendelssohn, pays a tribute to Delibes, composer of "Coppelia," "Sylvia" and other ballets, and even suggests that tuneful Waldteufel of the waltz fame!

The work is calm, white, chaste, marble-figured and built in architecture of the Dorian mood.

It is a charming and melodic work and if it did not bear the name of Stravinsky it could have come out of the unknown writings of even Franz Schubert!

The other number on the program was the Schumann Symphony in B flat major, wherein Mr. Koussevitzky seemed to have given it too popular a treatment. He accentuated certain passages until they sounded like Rosenfeld-classic-jass and made one expect any moment to see Ruyvettes come tiptoeing around the corner. As

N. Y. TIMES

NOV 2 3 1928

MUSIC

By OLIN DOWNES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, was a triumph of an expert body of instrumentalists and a conductor of brilliant endowments and command of his men. As a sheerly musical occasion it was less impressive. The music, when it was of dubious value, was exalted by the prowess of the conductor. The work which had the most genuine music in it of anything on the program—Schumann's B flat symphony—was given a virtuoso interpretation which in some places robbed the music of its simple and unsophisticated charm. The audience, with reason, rejoiced in the character of the performances.

The first performance in New York of Stravinsky music for ballet "Apollon Musagete" was given. This ballet was given its first performance anywhere at Elizabeth Coolidge's Chamber Music Festival in the Library of Congress last April 27. The music was played far better last night than in Washington; the score made no better impression on this writer than it did at the American première. Stravinsky writes for the nonce in the style of the classic French ballet, working occasional excursions into other manners and periods. He does this with exemplary skill, with transparent and expert scoring for the strings with the finished technic of a modern master. Saying which there is little more to be said.

The piece is plausible. It affords a polished and empty imitation of styles and models that it is fashionable to imitate in musical Paris of today, which Stravinsky, expatriated, makes his home, and where he is flattered and fêted. The emptiness and facility of the music soon become a weariness to the flesh. Why should it stop? Why not write a dozen more dance pieces that posture and prattle of nothing. Stravinsky, perhaps to amuse himself at the expense of the idolaters, to whom anything and everything he does is miracle and revelation, now cultivates more or less deliberately the musical platitudes of other times than this one, and calls the result a day's work and another commission filled.

Mr. Koussevitsky's performance of the Schumann symphony was in part one of rare eloquence and in part a virtuoso version of a familiar and beautiful piece of music. For this performance he strengthened his wind choir, but without harm to the proportions of the composition. He dared to take the slow movement at such a moderate pace that the ardent, long-breathed melody would have dropped apart in the hands of another conductor. But the melody was sung with a vernal warmth and languor which became it well.

If Mr. Koussevitsky had been less inclined to be [redacted] gratuitous prominence on insignificant details of the accompaniment the result would have been still more felicitous. His tempi in parts of the scherzo and of the finale were unconventional, and perhaps excessively fast. True, the pulse of this symphony does not beat as rapidly today as it did in the first half of the nineteenth century. Mr. Koussevitzky gave the music animation and he made Schumann's orchestra, which is sometimes thick, "sound." Perhaps it is too much to ask for more.

This writer would have welcomed less of the virtuoso element in certain pages and more of the adorable simplicity native to the Schumann of the "Spring" Symphony.

In the interpretation of Scriabine's curious, erootic and picturesquely flambouyant effusion—the "Poeme de l'Extase" conductor and orchestra excelled. The performance, as memory goes, was better because it was more spontaneous, coherent and cumulative in effect than a performance of the same piece that Mr. Koussevitzky gave seasons ago here. One wonders whether the secret of such interpretation will not die with Mr. Koussevitzky, at least with a chosen few of his colleagues who may reach his height of eloquence with the music—although we doubt this.

The reason for such a speculation is that probably no musician will take the "Poeme l'Extase" very seriously when fifty more years have passed; and if an interpreter cannot take a piece of music seriously he is likely to fail to make his audience do so. The "Poeme de L'Extase," which puzzled and shocked so many of us a few years ago, is now an affair of widening seams and patches. The mood, the keynote of the piece is passé. Scriabine discourses boudoir passion and parlor transcendalism. But he believes prodigiously in himself, and there is still a conductor to help him by at least pretending that he also believes.

Conductors of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers of evocation, however, are rare, and they will soon become rarer, so far as Scriabine is concerned. It was with a kind of reminiscent astonishment that one listened to this music last night, this strange and invertebrate conglomeration, which, by virtue of nothing much more than a technic and a colossal megalomania on the part of its composer somehow contrives to achieve something, if it is only a loud, blasting, incoherent shout into the ether. The scoring, of course, is gorgeous.

When the climax, which is so long in coming, at last arrives, it is one of resounding splendor. And this was the aftermath of nineteenth century romanticism in Russia, and so fitful and dying are the flares from its ashes today. The "Poeme de l'Extase" remains for the present a capital vehicle for a virtuoso conductor—a battle-horse which Mr. Koussevitzky rode so magnificently last night that the audience was moved to applaud, and applaud, and applaud.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 17 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzski's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Sergei Koussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's [redacted] interpreters of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York city. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

A tremendous ovation was accorded the orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky on their first concert in New York this season.

Richard Aldrich, the music critic of the New York Times, writes of the second concert on November 29:

"The performance of the symphony put all this orchestral skill and amazing virtuosity to their highest uses. It was a noble and beautiful performance, full of poetry and eloquence and overflowing with tonal color, a means to disclosing the true eloquence of the music. The performance was as splendid and sonorous in larger proportions as it was finished and ornate in detail; exquisitely adjusted in phrasing, free in its carefully considered nuances of tempo beauty. Such a performance shows how far Brahm's orchestration is from the 'muddiness' and 'grayness' that were once attributed to it. Mr. Koussevitzky set forth its deep, glowing richness of orchestral color in a miraculous way; and he made this and dynamics—all achieved with a consummate art that concealed art and that made the whole seem a natural and an inevitable expression of Brahm's thought."

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, No. 89 Asylum street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
DEC 1 2 1928

Boston Programs.

At the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Lea Luboschutz, violinist, will be the assisting artist, playing a Prokofieff Concerto for violin and orchestra. The programs will include "La Symphonie," Martinu; Two Pieces for String Orchestra, by Copland, the young American composer, and the Pastorale Symphony of Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME
DEC 24 1928

Notes

From Paris came roundabout word that Boston Symphony trustees have extended Conductor Serge Koussevitzky's contract indefinitely. The salary, it is said, "exceeds all expectations." Presumably it elevates Conductor Koussevitzky to a financial status comparable with that of Arturo Toscanini (New York Philharmonic Symphony) and Leopold Anton Stanislaw Stokowski (Philadelphia Orchestra).

216

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 19 1928

Boston Symphony

During the past month a number of recordings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Kous[redacted]ky have been made by the Victor Talking Machine Company at Symphony Hall, Boston. Experts from the Victor plant installed recording apparatus in the famous auditorium so that the entire orchestra, playing exactly as it would at a public performance, was recorded and will be available to record buyers in the near future. The contract between the Victor Company and the Boston Symphony is of long duration so it is probable that many other recording sessions will be held in Symphony Hall in the future.

A fine suggestion for Christmas gifts is the mailing of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert to your musical friends. They will appreciate hearing the great orchestra, under Koussevitzki's direction, as one of their most prized remembrances.

The Boston Symphony is playing better this season than ever before and Serge KoKussevitzky, hailed as one of the world's finest interpreters of the old classic symphonies, has no peer in the rendering of the modern compositions and the new Russian music. The orchestra numbers 112 players this season, all of whom will appear at the Hartford concert following a concert in New York City. Mr. Koussevitzky brought back from Europe this fall, several new artists, one being probably the most distinguished French horn player in Europe.

The seat sale is in progress at McCoy's, 89 Asylum Street. Tickets will be held until January 15.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES PICAYUNE
DEC 23

had not led to [redacted]

Scrutiny of a List

WE HAVE been scanning the list of the three hundred and some-odd names of those persons who have subscribed as guarantors of the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra for the coming year. The first fact that is discovered by such an examination is the distinct Americanism of the members. In fact, we doubt whether anywhere one could find a corresponding number of our citizens, associated in so artistic and altruistic a cause, among whom there would appear so few obviously foreign names.

We, of course ran down the roster, presented as it was in alphabetical order, to discover how fared the names of those almost sacrosanct families whose "conversational exclusiveness" has become a by-phrase of New England history—the Cabots and the Lowells. Running true to form, there were four Cabots on the list, that name having tied, for highest numerical honors, with the Holmes, Howes, Morses, Putnams, Richardsons and Jacksons. But of Lowells there was only one member present. There were found three Coolidges, three Curtises and three Sears.

Turning next from mere curiosity to what we might call the great staple names, we find just one Smith, one Brown, and not a single member of the extensive Jones family. There are some six or seven names, probably Jewish, or of Jewish origin, two beginning with "Mc.," that might be Scotch or Irish, but none of the many beginning with "O'," despite the usual assumption that Boston has an unusually large Hibernian population.

The other names on the roster are, in twos and singletons, an array of Ameses, Burrs, Days, Elerys, Fays, Fletchers, Frosts, Hayses, Hunnewells, Keys, Laphams, etc. There are a very few of German form or sound, but no Italian, Spanish or Slav name of easy determination. There was observed no Greek name, and less than half a dozen of French appearance, despite the very considerable Gallic population that has enfiltered into our "Down East" across from French Canada.

We customarily assume that the old line Americans of Anglo-Saxon stock are less musical than either the German or Latin races, and it is therefore more surprising to discover our foremost symphonic organization supported by descendants of the Puritans. This condition could not, we believe, have developed in any other section of our nation.

217

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 27 1928

BOSTON SYMPHONY

The great Boston Symphony orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky, the magnetic Russian conductor, who stands at the top in America, if not the world, is a most unique organization.

The Boston Symphony was the first symphony orchestra in America to have its own music hall, and giving a series of symphony concerts. The Boston orchestra at that time was backed financially by Colonel Higginson of Boston, who made up the deficit every season, while he lived, the deficit being a large sum in those days. The original orchestra numbered only about sixty players, while now, there are one hundred twelve musicians, a number of whom have been imported from the first rank orchestras of Europe.

The orchestra, at present gives sixty-seven concerts in Boston, with all tickets being subscribed for at the beginning of the season. The only way a ticket can be secured for the Boston concerts, is when a regular subscribed is out of town, and returns his seat to be resold to the box office.

The orchestra has been brought to the highest pinacle of perfection under the past five years' direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, and is now recognized as America's great symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky gives every summer in Paris, the "Concerts Koussevitzky" which considered the most important musical event of the Paris musical season. The Paris papers give Mr. Koussevitzky unstinted and most lavish praise for his interpretations of the old classic symphonies, and the modern French and Russian music, which electrified his fashionable audiences. The Hartford concert is only about a month away, February 3 and the seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, No. 89 Asylum street. Mail orders filled in order of their receipt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
DEC 27 1928

Boston Symphony

The Great Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Sergei Koussevitzky, the magnetic Russian conductor, who stands at the top in America, if not the world, is a most unique organization.

The Boston Symphony was the first symphony orchestra in America to have its own music hall, and giving a series of symphony concerts. The Boston orchestra at that time was backed financially by Colonel Higginson of Boston, who made up the deficit every season, while he lived, the deficit being a large sum in those days. The original orchestra numbered only about sixty players, while now, there are one hundred twelve musicians, a number of whom have been imported from the first rank orchestras of Europe.

The orchestra, at present give 67 concerts in Boston, with all tickets being subscribed for at the beginning of the season. The only way a ticket can be secured for the Boston concerts, is by a subscriber being out of town, returning their seats to be resold to the box office. Besides the Boston concerts, they make four or five weekly tours of the larger cities each season, Hartford being considered most fortunate through the efforts of Frank A. Sedgwick to be included in their itinerary for a great many years. The orchestra has been brought to the highest pinnacle of perfection under the past five years direction of Sergei Koussevitzky, and is now recognized as America's great symphony orchestra. Koussevitzky gives every summer in Paris, the "Concerts Koussevitzky" being considered the most important musical event of the Paris musical season. The Paris papers give Mr. Koussevitzky unstinted and most lavish praise of his wonderful interpretations of the old classic symphonies, and the modern French and Russian music, which electrified his fashionable audiences. The Hartford concert is only about a month away, February 3, and the seat sale is now in progress at McCoy's Music store, 89 Asylum Street. Mail orders filled in order of their receipt.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD
DEC

Arthur Honegger, whose arrival in this country has been awaited with growing interest for some years, sailed from Havre Dec. 26, and will arrive in New York Jan. 3. He will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra the week of [illegible] and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra Jan. 19 and 20. Mme. Cobina Wright, who will accompany him on his trans-continental tour, will entertain him in New York before their departure, with a repetition of her celebrated Society Circus.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. SUN

Ernest Toch's piano concerto will be an event of special interest at both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 3, and Saturday afternoon, January 5. This will be its first New York performance, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Mr. Koussevitzky will also play at the Thursday concert Handel's concerto grosso for string orchestra, in B minor; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," in which the soloists will be Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The Saturday matinee program will include, besides Toch's concerto, Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVE. POST
DEC 29 1928

ERNEST TOCH'S piano concerto will be an event of special interest at both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be its first New York performance, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Sanroma also played at the first Parisian performance of this piece at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last spring. Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment, but as an independent and important part of his score. The finale, entitled "Ronde disturbato," is in humorous vein in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and a softly persuasive theme.

Mr. Koussevitzky will also play at the Thursday concert Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, in which the soloists will be Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor. The Saturday matinee programme, will include, beside Toch's concerto, Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
HERALD-TRIBUNE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra pays its second New York visit this week.

At the Carnegie Hall concerts next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon Serge Koussevitzky will give the first New York performance of a piano concerto by the German composer Ernest Toch, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist. Mr. Sanroma also played this work under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction in its Paris premiere last spring.

According to the description of the concerto provided by the Boston Symphony management, Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment but as an independent and important part of the score. The finale, "Rondo Disturbato," is described as being in a humorous vein, in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and a softly persuasive theme. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the concert version of Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," with Marie Sundelius, soprano, formerly of the Metropolitan, and Joseph Lautner, tenor, as soloists, will be heard Thursday; Saturday's symphony will be Beethoven's "Pastoral."

The program for Friday at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has been changed and now consists of the Pastoral Symphony, Schumann's piano concerto, with Mr. Sanroma as soloist, and "Skyscrapers."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York American
DEC 30 1928

BOSTON [illegible] PHONY ORCHESTRA. Carnegie, 8:30 p. m. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.
Concerto Grosso ..... Haendel
"Unfinished" Symphony ..... Schubert
Concerto ..... Toch
Jesus Sanroma, solo pianist.
"Skyscrapers" ..... Carpenter
Marie Sundelius, soprano. Joseph Lautner, tenor soloist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM RICHMOND, VA.
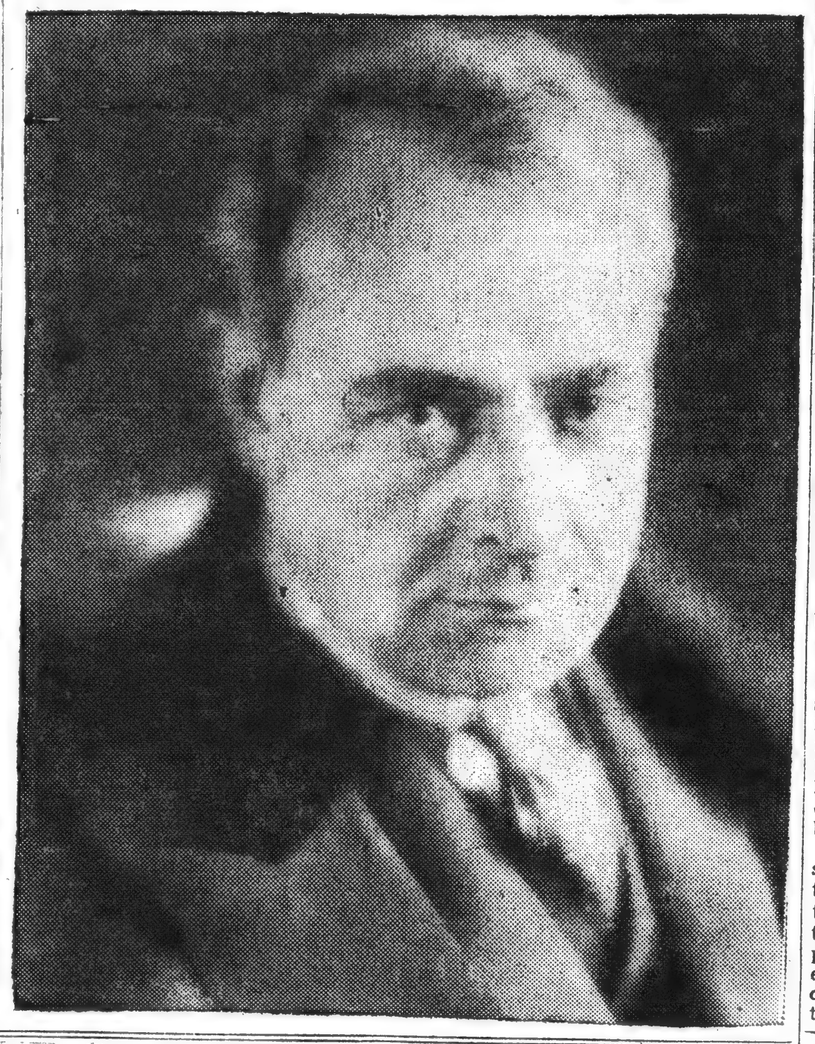
TIMES DISPATCH
DEC 30 1928

Noted Conductor Coming—Serge Koussevitsky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will conduct the Richmond concert of that distinguished musical group at the City Auditorium, the night of January 29.



Music Lovers Look Forward To Symphony

Boston Group Come Here for Concert at City Auditorium Next Month

Music lovers of this section are looking forward with interest to the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, third attraction in the artists' course of five concerts presented by Mrs. Wilson-Greene and T. Michaux Moody, assisted by Miss Vera Palmer. The group of 112 musicians with its distinguished conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will appear at the City Auditorium the night of Tuesday, January 29, at 8.30 o'clock. Advance reservations have been reported even more numerous than was the case when Kreisler played here early in this month. The box office will open tomorrow morning at Walter D. Moses and Company.

The Boston orchestra is nearly fifty years old and during its career has been headed by some of the most celebrated conductors the world has produced, while the number of concerts it has given in a season has steadily increased. Sixty-nine concerts in Boston alone have been planned for this season, in addition to a limited tour and several visits to New York. The programs are declared to be finer now than ever before.

Koussevitzky was in Europe last summer selecting a few new men for the orchestra and it is said of him that he chose each as if he were to be soloist, instead of taking a place in the great ensemble. This evidences the ability of the personnel of the orchestra, to which is added thorough and careful rehearsing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK WORLD

Ernest Toch's piano concerto will be an event of special interest at both concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. This will be its first New York performance, with Jesus Sanroma as soloist. Sanroma also played at the first Parisian performance of this piece at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last spring.

Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment, but as an independent and important part of his score. The finale, entitled "Rondo Disturbato" is in humorous vein, in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and a softly persuasive theme. Mr. Koussevitzky will also perform at the Thursday concert Handel's concerto grosso in B minor; Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, and Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" ballet, in which the soloists will be Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The Saturday matinee program will include, beside Toch's Concerto, Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony No. 6, and Ravel's "La Valse."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLYN EAGLE

Brooklyn Concerts

JOHN ALDEN CARPENTER'S "Skyscrapers," a Ballet of Modern American Life, will be performed by Serge Koussevitzky when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second concert of the season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. Solo voice parts will be taken by Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The soloist of the evening will be Jesus Maria Sanroma who will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's Piano Concerto. Mr. Sanroma is a young American musician of Central American parentage. He took the Mason and Hamlin prize several seasons ago and has since given recitals and appeared with orchestras with signal success. The symphony of this concert will be the Sixth ("Pastoral") of Beethoven.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
New York Telegraph

The Orchestras

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, returns on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. The Thursday program which has for its especial novelty, the Ernest Toch Piano Concerto, includes the Schubert "Unfinished Symphony," Carpenter's "Skyscrapers" and the Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor.

The Toch Concerto will have its first New York performance, and the soloist will be Jesus Sanroma, who also played the piece at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris last Spring, when the work had its first Parisian hearing. Toch treats the orchestra not as an accompaniment, but as and independent and important part of the score. The Finale entitled "Rondo Disturbato" is in a humorous vein, in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and softly persuasive theme.

In the "Skyscrapers" work, soloists will be Marie Sundelius, soprano and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

On Saturday afternoon, the Boston Symphony will play the Toch Concerto, Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony and Ravel's "La Valse."

▼

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN.
DEC 30 1928

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN

John Alden Carpenter's "Skyscrapers," a ballet of modern American life, will be performed by Serge Kousevitzky when the Boston Symphony Orchestra makes its second visit of the season to Brooklyn in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 4. The Chicago composer wrote this piece to describe a picture in rhythms and sounds of our modern frenetic existence with its characteristic violent alternation between work and play.

The work is depicted with a scene showing the framework of a gerat steel structure, and play, with a scene in Coney Island, in which jazz singers and dancers are introduced. It was produced with much success by the Metropolitan Opera Company, and was later introduced as a concert piece to Boston and New York by Serge Koussevitzky last spirng. Koussevitzky is repeating this score at both his Boston and New York concerts. Solo voices will be taken by Marie Sundelius, soprano, and Joseph Lautner, tenor.

The soloist of the vening will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, who will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's piano concerto. Sanroma is a young American musiciaan of Central American parents. He took the Mason & Hamlin prize several seasons ago, and has since given recitals and appeared with orchestras with signal success. He has been soloist with the Boston Symphonk Orchestra on several occasions, and is appearing in New York with them next week in a new concerto of Toch, which he played at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last spring. Sanroma was extremely successful in his recitals in Berlin, Paris, Madrid and Barcelona during his recent sojourn there. The symphony of this concert will be the "Pastoral" of Beethoven, No. 6.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

DEC 30 1928

NEW MUSIC TO BE HEARD

Ten Orchestral Programs in Coming Week Besides Today's Beethoven on Air

FRESH from a first hearing in Boston last Friday, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is bringing out Ernest Toch's piano concerto at both its concerts in Carnegie Hall this week, when the visiting organization pays its second visit of the season to New York. A new pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, will assist in the Toch concerto. He also played at the first Parisian performance of the same work last Spring at the Concerts Koussevitzky.

Toch treats the orchestra, according to Philip Hale's program note, not as an accompaniment, but as an independent and important part of his score. The finale, entitled "Rondo Disturbato," is in humorous vein, "in the nature of an argument between a loudly assertive and softly persuasive theme."

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

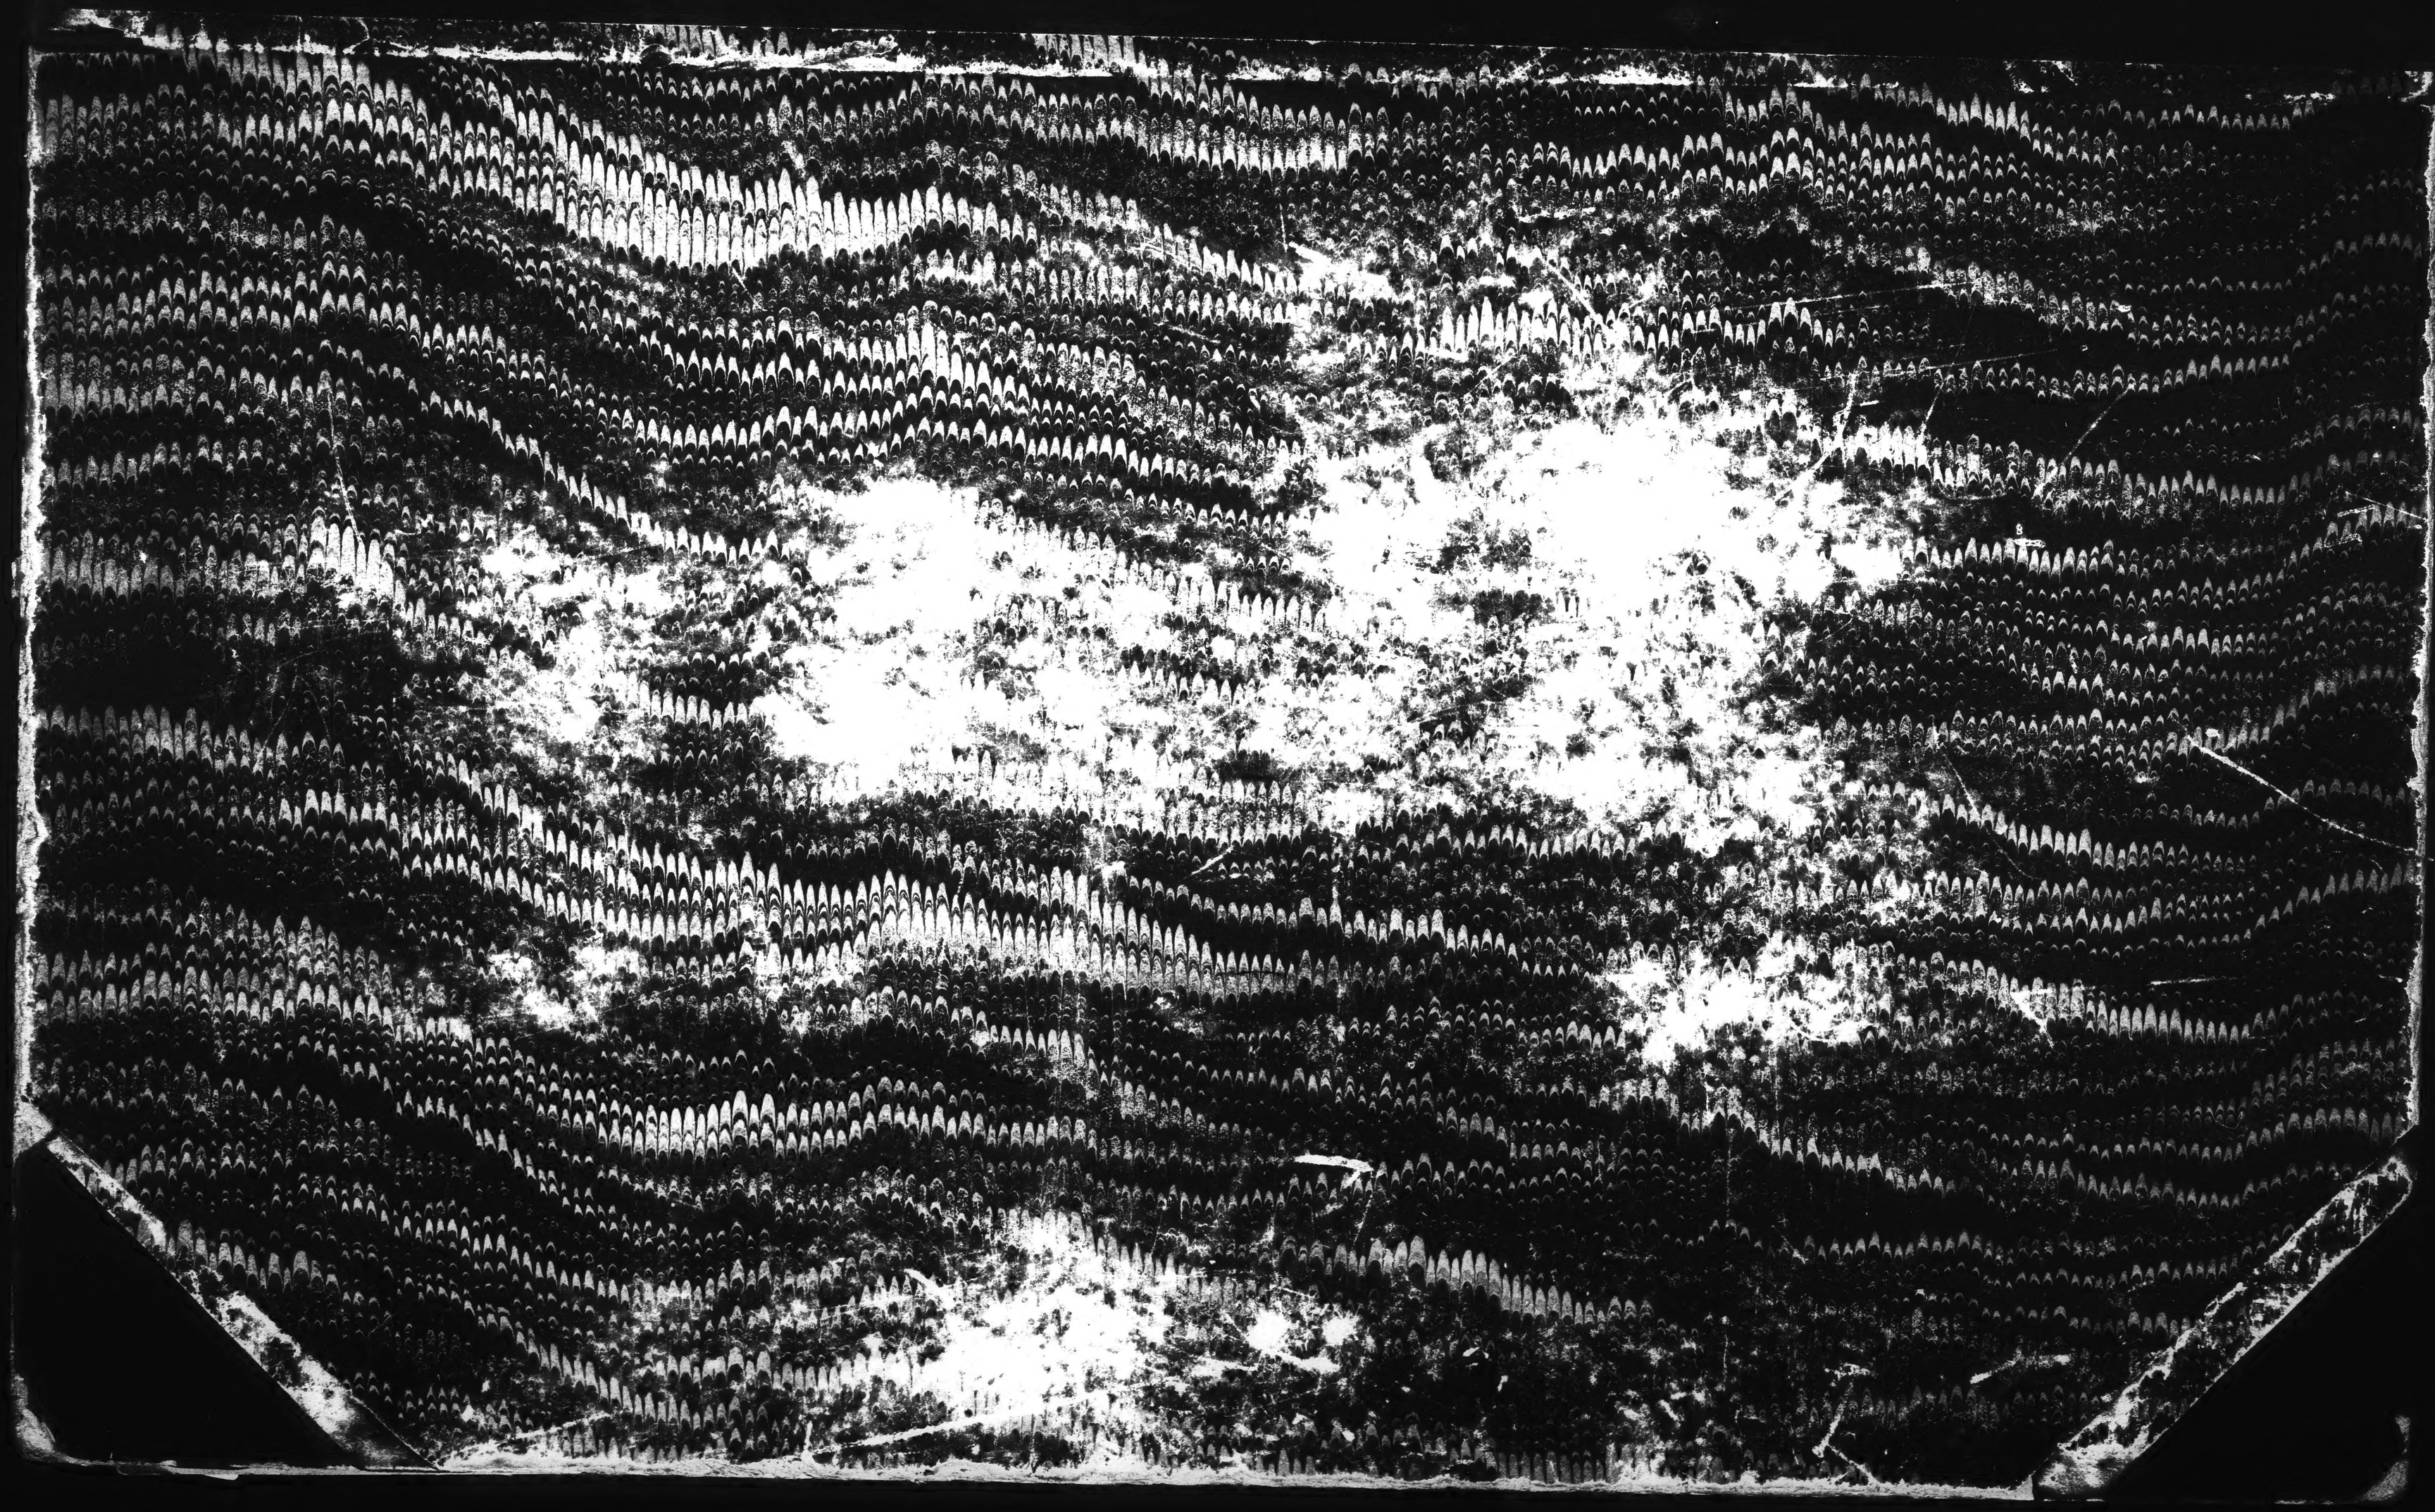
BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND